CONSTANCE (LAKEN OF), German Bodensee, anc. Brugantianus lacus, a lake of Europe between Switzerland and Germany, traversed from E to W by the Rhine. Length 42 m, extreme breadth 9 m, elevation above the sea, 1,250 feet, depth 964 feet. Its shores are bounded S by Switzerland, S E by Austria, N E by Bavaria and Wurtemberg, and N W by Baden. Near Constance it separates into two branches, Unter See (lower lake) on the W, and Ueberlingen See (Lake of Ueberlingen) on the N W of Constance. The principal part of the Boden-See communicates with the Unter See only by a narrow channel traversed by the Rhine. The waters of the lake are subject to rise and fall suddenly without apparent cause, a phenomenon which is called raikes. It is navigated by steam packets. The shores of the lake, which are in general flat, are very fertile. Principal affs. besides the Rhine, the Aach and Aigen on the W.

CONSTANCE (German Konstanz, anc. Constantia), a fortified city of the Grand Duchy of Baden, cap. circ. Lake on the S W shore of the Lake of Constance at the efflux of the Rhine 3 m N E Zurich. Pop. with suburbs (1846) 6,579. Chief edifices, a cathedral the Kaiserhaus, in which the famous council of Constance sat from 1414 to 1418 and which deposed three anti popes, and condemned Huss and Jerome of Prague), an ancient palace, a grand ducal residence, various conventual establishments and a theatre. One of its suburbs is connected with it by a long covered bridge across the Rhine. It has manufactures of cotton goods, watches and silk fabrics. CONSTANTINOPLE, Stamboul, the cap. of the Turkish, or formerly of the Byzantine, or Lower Roman empire, near the E. extremity of European Turkey, separated by the Bosphorus from Asia Minor. Lat. of St Sophia mosque, 41° 6' 18" N., lon. 28° 49' 14" E. Pop. (1848), including Pera, Galata, Soutari, etc., 715,300.—Stamboul, the city proper, 321,000. Of the gross pop. there were 421,000 Mussulmans, 278,000 non-Mussulmans, and 16,300 the floating pop., religion unknown. The city proper occupying a triangular promontory of land between the Bosphorus and its inlet the "Golden Horn," is about 3½ m. in length N. W. to S. E., by from 1 to 4 m. in breadth, enclosed by a triple range of walls 12½ m. in cir., and entered at present by 28 gates. The city is built on an undulating declivity, highest on the land side. Externally it has an imposing appearance with its mosques, cupolas, and minarets, interspersed with cypresses, and its port crowded with shipping; but internally it consists mostly of a labyrinth of crooked, ill-paved, and dirty lanes, and a crowd of low built and small houses, formed of wood or roughly hewn stone. Its drainage is favoured by its uneven site and a great number of public fountains, which amply supply the city with water brought from artificial tanks constructed at some distance. A great number of dogs are permitted to range the streets, which act as scavengers. Each ward has its own particular dogs, and should an individual cut trespass upon a neighbouring territory, he is immediately driven off by the dogs that occupy it. The climate is variable, and the temperature, especially in winter and spring, subject to great vicissitudes, snow and hard frost alternate with mild weather. The mean temp. of year 56°·3, winter 40°·7, summer 71°·2, Fahr. The annual quantity of rain is moderate. This capital, including its suburbs, contains 14 royal and 332 other mosques, 40 Mohammedan colleges, 183 hospitals, 36 Christian churches, several synagogues, 130 public baths, and 180 khans or inns, besides numerous bazaars, coffee houses, and caravanserais. The extreme point of the city on the E. is occupied by the "seraglio" or private domain of the Sultan, the boundaries of which are supposed to have been those of the anc. Byzantium. It comprises an area of about 3 m. in circ., separately enclosed by walls, and extending down to the Sea of Marmara. Its surface is "irregularly covered with detached suites of apartments, baths, mosques, kiosks, gardens, and groves of cypress." Its inner inclosure alone is devoted to the sole use of the Sultan and his harem; in the second court are the treasury, imperial kitchens and stables, divan, hall of justice, the arsenal, formerly the church of St Irene, and the Curialian column of Theodosius; and in the outer court (the anc. Forum Augusti), are the mint, various state offices, the infirmaries, etc. This court is entered from the city by a large and heavy gate termed the "Porte," a name which has thence been applied to the divan of the Turkish Sultan. Immediately without the seraglio, is the principal mosque of St Sophia, originally a Christian cathedral, built between 531 and 539, at a cost equivalent to 1,000,000*l*. This edifice is in the form of a Greek cross, 269 feet in length by 143 in breadth (in its interior), and surmounted by a flattened dome 180 feet above the ground, besides several minor cupolas, and 4 minarets added to it by the Turks. In its interior are numerous large columns, a floor of variegated marble, and bronze gates, but most of the ancient Byzantine paintings and decorations have been hidden by Turkish inscriptions, and the general effect of the building is destroyed by the presence of a multitude of lamps, globes, and other insignificant ornaments depending from the dome. A few years ago the interior was cleared and renovated, and it has now a magnificent appearance. Near St Sophia is the mosque of Achmet, a fine structure with a beautiful marble pavement, and six minarets, a number possessed by no other mosque in the Mohammedan world. This mosque stands on the At-meidan or "Horse course," the ancient Hippodrome of historic celebrity, a space 300 yards in length by 150 in breadth, and on which are the granite Theban obelisk set up by Theodosius, the broken pyramid of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, short of its bronze plates, and the identical twisted brass column which originally supported the tripod in the temple of Delphi. Other mosques are those of Soliman the Magnificent, of Mohammed II., Bajazet II., Selim II., Mustapha III., and Othman and Eyub, with the Valide mosque, built by the mother of Mohammed IV., and containing pillars from the ruins of Troy. Most of these establishments have attached to them one or more colleges or charitable institutions; that of Mohammed II. is surrounded by eight endowed academies, a diet house for the poor, hospital, caravanserais, and baths, all surmounted by lead-covered cupolas. There are government naval, military, and medical colleges, as well as numerous inferior schools, 49 public libraries, 3 government printing establishments, and 13 journals are printed in six different languages. The bazaars are extensive and well supplied, but have no architectural beauty; the numerous cemeteries in and around the city are among its greatest ornaments. Principal antiquities are the burnt column, erected by Constantine the Great, a part of the column of Arcadius, the pillar of Marcian, vestiges of the Boucoleon palace, built by Theodosius II., the aqueduct of Valens, various subterranean cisterns, the principal of which is called by the Turks the "thousand and one columns," is a vault 240 feet in length by 200 feet in width, supported by 424 pillars. At the S.W. angle of the city is the citadel of the "seven towers" now used as a military store-house (Hepkapyrgium). The city proper comprises separate quarters for the Jews, Armenians, and Greeks, that of the last, "the Fanar," extends along the shore of the "Golden Horn." This harbour, which has usurped the name of the promontory on which Byzantium was built, extends between the city and its suburbs Pera, Galata, etc., for about 4½ m. S.E. to N.W., breadth varying from 1 to 4 furlongs. It is deep enough to float ships of the largest size, can receive 1,200 sail of the line, and is always full of mercantile and other vessels, with a vast number of light boats, which here form the principal vehicles of transport. Two bridges of boats connect Stamboul with Galata, and a third near the upper end of the harbour, with the suburb Khasakendi; besides which suburb, those of Cassim Pasha, Tophana, Galata, and Tershana, with the imperial arsenals and dockyard, are on its N. shore. [See the articles on these suburbs, also SCUTARI.] Imports consist of corn, iron, timber, tallow, furs, cotton stuffs, and yarn, woollens, silks, metallic goods, watches, jewellery, furniture, dyes, drugs, coffee, sugar, wax, copper, gums, and porcelain. Exports consist of silk, carpets, hides, wool, goats' hair, potash, gall, yellow berries, linseed, madder, valonia, bones. Manufactures: morocco leather, millinery, shoes, meerschaum-pipe bowls, mouth-pieces, pipe-tubes; and expressly for the manufacture of the last, large numbers of cherry-trees are raised near the city. Constantinople is the see of Greek, Armenian, and Catholic-Armenian

CON patibereba. It was originally founded by Byzans, A.D. 666, and rebuilt by Constantine A.D. 836, since which it has been repeatedly besieged, but only twice taken, viz., in 1204 by the Crusaders, who retained it till 1261, and by the Turks under Mohammed II., May 29th, 1453—an event which marked the final extinction of the Roman empire in the East.

CORDOVA or Cordoba (French Cordú, anc. Corduba), a city of Spain, cap. prov. of same name, and formerly cap. of kingdom, in a salubrious plain on the Guadalquivir, 86 m. N.E. Sevilla. Lat. 37° 58' 15" N., lon. 4° 49' 36" W. Pop. (1867) 160,000. Its Moorish walls enclose a large area, much of which is now occupied by gardens or by ruins, except one large square, bordered by lofty and handsome edifices. It communicates with a suburb across the river by a stone bridge of 16 arches, commanded by a Saracenic castle. Its cathedral, formerly a Mohammedan mosque, and still one of the most remarkable edifices in Spain, presents in its interior a "labyrinth of columns" of all orders and materials. Other buildings are 18 parish churches, convents, the bishop's palace, the city hall, hospitals, foundling and other asylums, three colleges, and several schools. The Cordovan manufactures of leather (hence called Cordwain) have declined into insignificance; but the silversmiths and filigree workers of this city maintain their repute; and manufactures of paper, barrels, hats, and silken fabrics are carried on. Cordova was taken by the Moors in 672, and for many centuries afterwards remained the cap. of the "Caliphate of the West," and was occupied and pillaged by the French in June 1808. Cordova was for some time comprised in the country of the kings of Seville. It was taken by Ferdinand III., king of Castille, in 1236, and became cap. of one of the four old provs. of Andalucía, with the title of kingdom. The prov. of Cordova is bounded N. by Badajoz and Ciudad Real, E. by Jaen, S. and S.E. by Granada and Malaga, and S.W. by Sevilla. It retains its old boundaries unaltered by the decree of 1834.

Leaotung, by a woody palisade, and having N. Manchouria, E. the Sea of Japan, and W. the Yellow Sea. Area including islands, 80,000 sq. m. Coast line elevated and fertile; the interior is little known. Products, wheat, millet, rice, cotton, hemp, tobacco, ginseng, the fruits of Northern China, cattle, timber, furs, bullion, iron, rock-salt, and coal. Manufactures are similar to those of the Chinese, whose habits and religion mostly prevail amongst the population, though the Koreans use an alphabetic and not symbolic mode of writing. Commerce chiefly with Japan, whence are imported pepper, aromatic woods, alum, horns, Japanese and Dutch manufactured goods. The trade with China is stated to be wholly contraband; and no Korean trader is suffered to settle in China, or Chinese in Corea. Government despotic; and the election of the sovereign, and many of his important public acts, must be approved by the Emperor of China. Coron is divided into 8 provinces; chief city, Han-ching. It became subject to China at the end of the 17th century, to which country it sends every four years an embassy, with tribute in ginseng root, skins, cotton, pepper, silk, horses, and silver ingots. The Archipelago of Coron comprises numerous islands and islets in the Yellow Sea, and on the coasts of the peninsula; the chief are Quelpaert and Amherst.—Coron Strait is between the peninsula of Coron and the island of Kiusiu.

CORNWALL, a co. of England, forming its S.W. extremity, enclosed on all sides by the sea, except E., where it is mostly separated from Devonshire by the river Tamar. Length, 78 m.; breadth, 49 m. Area 866,474 ac., of which 700,000 are estimated to be arable, pasture, and meadow lands. Pop. 325,558. Surface intersected from W. to E. by a ridge of rugged and bleak hills, and scantily timbered, but it has some fertile valleys. Between Mount Bay and the Scilly Islands, there were woods, meadows, and arable lands, and 140 parish churches, which had been submerged by the ocean; and the sub-marine forests show, in this tract, a subsidence of at least 13 feet. On the N. coast, a considerable extent of surface has been overwhelmed with shifting sand, covering hills of several hundred feet in height. Shores greatly indented by inlets of the sea, the principal of which are St Ives and Padstow, harbours on the Irish Sea; and on the English Channel, St Bazez Bay, Falmouth harbour, and Mount Bay, between the promontories of the Lizard and Land's End. Principal rivers, the Tamar, Lynher, Tovey, Fal, and Camel or Alan. The climate is mild, especially in winter, but damp, with cloudy atmosphere, and frequent rain, yet salubrious. Myrtles and some other plants of South Europe flourish in the open air, but fruits do not ripen well. Corn and potatoes are the chief crops, and agriculture has lately improved. The pichard fishery is actively carried on. Cornwall is rich in metals, its tin mines have been known and wrought from remote antiquity. The great metallic district extends from Dartmoor in Devonshire on the E., to the Land's End on the W. Tin is found most abundantly in the St Just, St Ives, and St Austell dists. Copper in the dists. Gwennap, Redruth, Camborne, Breage, Marazion, and Gurnear. Silver, lead, zinc, iron, manganese, antimony, cobalt, and bismuth, are also found in various localities. The tin produced is estimated to average 5,000 tons annually, and the annual average yield of copper is 6,000 tons. Nearly all the ores are sent into South Wales to be smelted. About 5,000 tons of soapstone, and 7,000 dn. of porcelain clay, are shipped annually from Cornwall for the potteries. The exports are nearly confined to tanning produce and fish. Manufactures almost wholly domestic. Cornwall, including the Scilly Islands, is subdivided into 9 hundreds, and 203 par., all in the diocese of Exeter, and 5 W. circuit. Before the Reform Act it contained 20 bor., many of them being mere vill., each sending 2 members to House of Commons. It now, with its towns, returns 10 members, including 2 for each division of the county. Reg. electors (1848) for the E. division 6,187; for the W. do. 6,212. Principal towns, Bodmin, Truro, Launceston, Falmouth, Penryn, and Penzance. This part of Britain was not subdued by the Saxons till the time of Athelstan, and its vernacular language (Cornish, a dialect of the Celtic) has become extinct only during the present century. The dist. contains many Druidical stones.

GRIMSKA (Chersonesus Taurica), a peninsula of Europe, in the Black Sea, forming a pendant to Russia, with which it is connected on the N. by the narrow isthmus of Perekop. It is of a quadrangular form, having its greatest extension from W. to E., on which latter side it is prolonged by the sub-peninsula of Kerch, between lat. 44° 44' and 46° 8' N., corresponding with that portion of France included between Bordeaux and La Rochelle, lon. 38° 30' and 36° 35' E., corresponding with Russia, between St Petersburg and Moscow. Extreme length 100 m., breadth 110 m. The whole of the N.E. angle, from Perekop to the Strait of Yenikale, is devastated by the encroachments of the Putrid Sea, a collection of stagnant water, exhaling pestilential vapours. The central and W. portion is a vast steppe, devoid of mountains or forests, interspersed with salt lakes and marshes, exposed to the severity of a Russian winter, and the small rivers of which are dried up by the heat of summer. Large flocks of broad-tailed sheep and cattle are pastured on these plains, and the salt obtained from the lakes yields a large revenue. The S. coast of the Crimea, defended from the N. winds by a range of wooded mountains, from the sides of which numerous semicircular valleys slope southwards to the Black Sea, presents the most striking contrast to the other parts of the peninsula. Here the climate resembles that of Asia Minor or Italy: winter is scarcely felt, trees seldom lose their verdure, and the primrose and spring saffron appear in February. The olive, fig, vine, and pomegranate; the cistus and other delicate flowers, grow luxuriantly in the open air. The most celebrated of these valleys is that of Balda, which, on account of its beauty and fertility, is termed the "Crimean Tempé." Its W. end is 5 m. S.E. of Balaklava, and it extends 10 m. E., with a breadth of 3 to 5 miles. It is entirely surrounded by high mountains, and presents a succession of cultivated fields, woods, and meadows. The villages are clean, and the inhabitants prosperous. The mountainous country in which these sheltered valleys are situated, occupies less than a fourth part of the superficies of the peninsula. The mountains curve in the direction of the S. coast from the W. of Balaklava to the Bay of Kaffa. On the S. they present a series of calcareous cliffs, sloping gradually towards the steppes on the N.; the culminating point, Tchatur-dagh, is 5,000 feet above the sea. The principal rivers are the Alma, the Salghur, and the Karasu. The climate of the Crimea is most unequal at all seasons, but especially so in winter, and varies much, according to position, in the mountains, steppes, and valleys. In some winters frost is hardly known, while in others severe frost, accompanied by N. winds, continues from October until April. In 1787 the Sea of Asof, the Putrid Sea, and part of the Bay of Kaffa, were frozen so as to bear the passage of men and horses. The N. wind, which alone brings frost, is often suddenly followed by E. and S.W. winds, which always bring rain, the E. and S.E. winds bring fine weather. In summer the temperature sometimes rises to 100° Fahr. In the shade, when the rivulets are dried up, and the soil of the steppes is parched and dusty. The difference of temperature in 24 hours often exceeds 20° Fahr. Spring, which usually extends from the beginning of March to the end of May, is the most genial and healthy season, having a mild temperature and a soreness. Autumn, the most unhealthy season, is marked by the occurrence of intermittent and bilious fevers. The heavy rains cease generally about the middle of October. The mountains are snow-clad till about the middle of May. The forests furnish the pine, beech, oak, elm, ash, and poplar, and give shelter to the wolf, fox, roe, buck, fallow deer, and hare. Domestic animals comprise the horse, camel, dromedary, buffalo, oxen, and several species of sheep. Among birds are the vulture of the Alps, the kite, and a species of falcon, used by the Tartars in their favourite amusement of hawking. Trout of a large size and excellent quality abound in the rivers, and the sea supplies the sturgeon, mullet, mackerel, and pilchard. The rural population is entirely Tartar except a few German and other colonists in the S. The Tartars have perceived many of the customs of their ancestors, and are hospitable to strangers. The Crimea forms the greater part of the Russian gov. Taurida, the pop. of which in 1846 was 572,200, is divided into the dists of Simferopol the cap, Eupatoria, Theodosia or Kaffa, and Perekop, its chief towns. It was known as the Chersonesus Taurica 1,400 years B.C. Its history is a catalogue of invasions and changes, in the course of which it has been subjected to more than 60 dynasties, including the Scythians, Greeks, Romans, Tartars, Genoese, and Turks. Russia acquired it by treaty in 1783 under the Empress Catherine II. In 1778 its pop. was estimated at 500,000, but under the despotism of the Czar it decreased by emigration to 285,600 in 1793, and is still decreasing. Its ancient cities have been ruined and its resources neglected. Russian improvement has been limited to the erection of the new town of Simferopol, the harbour and fortifications of Sevastopol, and the summer palace of the Empress and the nobles on its S.E. shores. The Anglo-French army landed in Kalamita Bay, on the W. coast, 14th September, defeated the Russians on the 4th and 16th September and commenced the siege of Sevastopol 17th October 1854.

It is of an elongated narrow shape, greatest length 764 m., breadth varying from 25 to 130 m. Area, including its dependent islands, about 32,900 sq. m. Pop. (1850) 1,449,483, of whom 564,898 were whites; free mulattoes, 216,176; slaves, 662,587. The coasts are surrounded with reefs and shallows, and only one-third of them accessible to vessels; on this part, however, there are several harbours. There are numerous islets surrounding the coast, the principal of which are Los Pinos, Romano, Turignano, Cruz, and Cuco. The S.E. part of the island is intersected by a mountain range, the Montañas del Cobre, the highest parts attaining an elevation of 8,690 feet; this chain extends along the greater part of the length of the island. The northern part is more level, with rich valleys and plains. Extensive lagoons and salt marshes lie along the flat shores. There are no large rivers. Some are navigable for a few miles inward for boats; others are used for irrigating the fields. The climate is more temperate than that of the other West Indian Islands, but also more variable. Snow never appears even in the highest parts; but hail-storms occur sometimes, and ice occasionally is formed at an elevation of a few hundred feet. Hurricanes are less frequent on land than in the other islands, though common in the neighbouring ocean, but earthquakes are frequent. W. winds prevail during the cold season, and rain falls every month of the year. Except in the low marshy grounds the climate is salubrious, and invalids from the United States resort to the is. The towns on the coasts and the W. parts are the most unhealthy, the central depas. the healthiest. Among the whites ague and yellow fever are the chief diseases. The most fatal months for Europeans are May, June, July, and August. The healthiest months are January, February, March, April, and November. The reverse is the case with the Crookes, for the yellow fever, which, during the hot season, cuts off the former, generally spares the latter. Primary rocks and limestone prevail in the mountain districts. The copper mines are generally in the E part of the island. In 1864, the quantity of this metal exported, represented a sixth part of that of the globe. Mines of excellent coal have been discovered, and there are many mineral springs in the island. Extensive districts in the mountain regions are covered with dense forests, among which the majestic oaks and mahogany trees are conspicuous, with other valuable wood fit for ship building, and palms, plantains, and beautiful ornamental trees abound. Only a small proportion of the land, about 2,000,000 acres, is yet under cultivation, but it produces abundant crops of maize, yams, bananas, potatoes, sugar, coffee, tobacco, cotton, cocoa, and indigo. The uncultivated portions contain extensive and fertile prairies, where cattle are extensively reared. Only one indigenous quadruped has been found, the Amia, resembling a rat, and 18 inches in length. Amphibious reptiles, as the alligator, manatee, tortoise, and serpents from 10 to 12 feet in length, abound. Birds of beautiful plumage are numerous, and flocks of various kinds swarm along the coasts. Cuba is divided into three parts, the S E and central being the richest and most populous, and containing 22 cities and towns, and 204 villa and hamlets. Chief towns, Havana, Santiago, Matanzas, Santa Clara, Santa Maria, Trinidad, etc. The commercial prosperity of Cuba has been of late years on the increase. Provisions of all kinds, and manufactured goods, are the chief articles of importation. The exports amounted to 26,764,692 dollars. With all this trade it has no banks, and though it has only a specie currency, no other country is there so much paper money. The internal traffic is now facilitated by improved roads, and several miles of railway were opened from 1844 to 1854. The government of the island is vested in a captain-general, who is supreme military commandant and civil governor of one of the provinces. There is a governor of the other provinces, who has independent civil power, responsible only to the Court of Spain. There is a military garrison of several battalions, and a marine force of 4 frigates, 15 steam ships, and 32 small craft. Steamboats ply between Havana and other parts of the coast. No foreigner can land on the island without procuring the security of a native of responsible ability for his good behaviour. Cuba was discovered by Columbus in his first voyage in 1492. In 1511, the first settlement was made by the Spaniards, and soon after the aboriginal inhabitants were wholly exterminated. In 1762, Havana was captured and taken possession of by the British, but restored to the Spaniards next year. In 1800, and again in 1851, a piratical attempt was made on Cuba by a band of United States adventurers, under the command of a Spaniard named Narvaez Lopez, they were defeated, and their leader executed. Cuba, from its position, and the nature of the trade-winds and gulf stream, might control the trade and intercourse of the whole Gulf of Mexico and the islands in the Caribbean Sea. [HAVANA]

DANUBE (German Donau, anc. Danubius and Ister), an important river, and, next to the Volga, the largest in Europe, originates in the Brage, a mountain torrent which rises in the K. declivity of the Schwarzwald in Baden, at an elevation of 2,850 feet above the level of the sea. This stream, when joined by the Brigach, and by the waters of a spring from the castle garden of Donauerschingen, takes the name of the Danube. It flows first generally E.N.E. through an alpine country to Ulm, thence E.N.E. and E.S.E. to Passau it traverses the plain of Bavaria. From Passau to Vienna, E.S.E., it intersects a hilly region, and the remainder of its course, E.S.E. to Waitzen, S. to Bacz, and E. to the Black Sea, is through a country, generally flat, except at the defile of the "iron gate" E. of Orsova. Length (direct) 1,000 m., or including windings, 1,725 m. It drains the waters from a surface of nearly 274,000 sq. m.; its average fall is 18 inches per mile, but below Fusch it is only 3 inches; at Ulm it is 1,400 feet, at Regensburg 1,000, at Passau 800, at Vienna 450, and at Fusch 900 feet above the level of the sea. Its breadth at Ulm is 108 feet, and in its lower course 6,000 feet; depth at Ulm, 6 feet, at Passau 16 feet, and lower down average 20 feet. It passes Sigmaringen and Ulm in Württemberg, Dillingen, Hochaltd, Donauwörth, Ingolstadt, Regensburg, and Passau in Bavaria; Linz, Dornstein, Kornenburg, and Vienna, in Austria; Presburg, Komorn, Gran, Waitzen, Buda-Pesth, Peterwarden, and Carlowitz in Hungary; Belgrade, Semendria, and Orsova in Servia; Widin, Nicopol, Rastchuk, Silistria, and Hirsova, in Bulgaria; Giurgewo, and Brailor, in Wallachia. The chief affs. of the Danube are, on the right, the Ilser, Lech, Isar, Inn, Enn, Raab, Drava, Sava, Morava, Timok, Iakar, Vid, and Jantra; and on the left, the Altmühl, Nab, Rupa, March, Waag, Graa, Theiss, Temes, Chyl, Alana, Jakuzimica, Koruth, and Fruth. Near its mouth in the Black Sea it separates into several branches, the largest of which, called the St George mouth, forms, by the treaty of Adrianople, the boundary between the Ottoman empire and Russia, the others are the Sulina mouth, and the Kilia mouth. It communicates by canals with the Elbe by means of the Moldau, and with the Rhine by the Altanühl. It is navigable for vessels of 100 tons from Ulm. Steam packets were established on the Danube in 1830.

DENMARK (KINGDOM OF), a state of Northern Europe, cap. Copenhagen. It is composed of three distinct parts, I. the islands in the Baltic and Atlantic, II. the peninsula of Jutland, and III. its dependencies, the duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg. The principal portion is situated between lat. 58° 21' 42" and 67° 44' 53" N., lon. 6° 3' and 12° 37' E. Area 21,836 sq. m. Pop. (1855) 2,468,848. It is bounded N. and W. by the North Sea, E. by the Cattegat and the Baltic, and S. by the Elbe. The coasts are greatly indented, and the country is perfectly flat; in the N. some parts of it are below the level of the sea, from the invasions of which it is defended by dykes. On the E. the surface rises into gentle elevations. The highest part of the peninsula is 500 feet, and of the islands 400 feet above the sea. Holstein and Lauenburg are the best watered districts. Among the islands, only Seeland and Fühnen have rivers, the others being watered by mere brooks. Extensive marshes exist in all the valleys of the peninsula and the islands. Next to the Elbe, which forms the S. boundary of the kingdom for 80 m., the Lister is the largest and most important river. The largest lake is the Arre in Seeland. The principal gulfs are the Lamm-hord, Ringkjobing-fjord, Nissum-fjord, and the Bays of Kalløse and Flensburg on the continent; the Ice-fjord in Seeland, and Odense-fjord, in Fühnen. Between the islands and the peninsula of Denmark and Sweden, there are several passages called sounds, the chief of which are Ore Sund (the Sound), and the Great and Little Belts. The climate of Denmark is humid and cloudy, but, notwithstanding its northern position, it is, from the lowness of its level and the influence of the surrounding seas, much milder than the countries of Germany situated farther S. Mean temp. of the year 46° 6 Fahr.; shortest day 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ hours; longest day 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ hours. Storms are rare, and of short duration; average annual days of storm 9, rain 137; snow 32. Prevailing winds, W. during spring and summer, and S.W. in autumn and winter. Soil almost entirely alluvial, covered with a vegetable mould well adapted for cultivation, in Jutland and the duchies, and producing excellent pasture in the marshy districts. The proportion of cultivated to marsh land is as two to one. Corn is raised more than necessary for home consumption. The principal crops are barley, wheat, oats, buck-wheat, potatoes, hemp, flax, tobacco, and hops. Forests are not extensive, and mostly confined to the E. coasts of the peninsula and the islands Seeland and Fühnen. Cattle are extensively reared in N. Jutland and the Danes. Horses of an excellent breed, and valuable for military purposes, are reared on a great scale, and exported in the average number of 11,000 per annum. Sheep are of a superior kind. Goats are kept in small numbers, pigs are plentiful, and game is abundant. Oysters, herrings, salmon, and seals are fished on the coasts and in the rivers. As Denmark has no mountains, except in Bornholm, where an inferior quality of coal is found, its mineral products are insignificant. Woolen cloths, linens, bonnets, and paper, are manufactured for home consumption. Government formerly protected several branches of manufactures, but these are now confined to the porcelain works at Copenhagen, and the cloth factory at Helsingør. Roads in general are bad, the best are in Seeland, Fühnen, and the duchies. Railways are in operation from Altona to Kiel (with branch to Glückstadt), Neumünster to Rendsburg, Hamburg to Berlin, and Copenhagen to Roskilde. The geographical position of the country is favourable for water communication, and there are many extensive canals, the chief of which are the Schleswig-Holstein Canal, which with the Eider river forms a communication between the Baltic and the German Ocean, navigable for vessels of 120 tons, and the Stecknitz Canal in Lauenburg, which joins the Elbe to the Baltic by means of the river Trave. The principal ports are Copenhagen, Altona, Kiel, Flensburg, and Aalborg. Official value of importations in 1853, 46,610,387 crowns; do. of exports, 34,408,345 crowns, comprising agricultural products, horses, oxen, beer, and brandy, with the exports from Iceland, Greenland, and the Farø islands, consisting of eider down, feathers, skins, dried fish, and wool. The number of merchant vessels belonging to the state was, in 1847, 3,905. Aggregate burden 70,380 lasts. The Danish government is (with the exception of the duchy of Lauenburg) an absolute monarchy, but since 1834 it is restricted by a national representation. The duchies of Schleswig and Holstein revolted from Denmark in 1848, but the dispute was accommodated in 1852. As Duke of Holstein and Lauenburg, the king was a member of the German Confederation, and had three votes in the full council of the diet; his contingent to the military force was 8,600 men. By the constitution of 1849, the kingdom is divided into four political provinces, represented by four prov. estates, the members of which are elected for six years. The pop. is divided into three classes, nobles, citizens, and peasants. The state religion is Lutheran, and the king is the head of the church; other sects are tolerated. The poor are provided for by assessment. Elementary education is widely diffused in Denmark, attendance at school is obligatory from the age of 7 to 14. The system of mutual instruction, introduced in 1826, was generally adopted in 1840. The university of Copenhagen, founded 1478, had, in 1842, 39 professors and 1,100 students, a museum of natural history, and a library of 100,000 volumes; and the university of Kiel, founded 1685, 31 professors, 250 students, museum, botanic garden, and an extensive library. The military force of the kingdom consisted, in 1842, of 24,523 men. In 1864, the navy had 5 ships of the line, 6 frigates, 3 corvettes, 3 brigs, 3 schooners, 6 steamers, and 90 gun-boats. Total, 180 vessels, carrying in all 683 guns. Public rev. (1853) 31,587,366 crowns. Expend. 20,906,744 crowns. The continental part of Denmark, formerly called the Cimbric Chersonesus, was the country of the Cimbræ, who ravaged Europe 100 years B.C. Its first kings were descendants of Odin, and hence issued many of the pirates, who, under the name of Normans, long ravaged Western Europe, and under whom the Danes made incursions into England in 885 and 1042. After conversion to Christianity, the Danes were long the leaders in the affairs of the north. The celebrated Margaret of Denmark, by the treaty of Calmar in 1397, united the three kingdoms of the north, and after the dissolution of the union, the Danes kept possession of Norway till 1814, when it was ceded to Sweden. The colonial possessions of Denmark consist of the islands of Farø and Iceland, and part of the coast of Greenland, and the tropical possessions, comprise the Danish West India islands, St Croix, St Thomas, and St John, with a number of smaller islands, the aggregate pop. of these possessions amounted, in 1854, to 117,184. The establishments on the coast of Guinea, viz. Forts Christiansborg, Fredensborg, etc., were ceded to Britain by purchase, in 1850. The town of Tranquebar, with its districts, on the Coromandel coast, ceded to Denmark by the rajah of Tanjore in 1620, and the small dist. and town of Serampore (Danish Frederiksnagar) in Bengal, founded by the Danish East India Co. in 1755, were transferred to Britain in 1845. The Nicobar Islands, in the Bay of Bengal, were taken possession of by the Danes in 1766; in 1840 the pop. of the Danish colony amounted to 6,000, but they were abandoned in 1848, on account of their insalubrity.

(of observatory) 54° 58' N., lon. 1° 38' W. Area of bor. 10,260 ac. Pop. 13,163. It has a cathedral and castle, occupying the summit of a steep rocky eminence surrounded by hanging gardens and plantations, and nearly enclosed by the Wear, here crossed by several bridges, and beyond which on either side are the quarters of Framwellgate and Elvet. The cathedral, founded in 1063, including the western porch, is 567 feet in length, by 200 feet in greatest breadth, and has a central tower 214 feet in height; a fine W. front with a Galilee chapel and two richly ornamented towers, 145 feet in height. The see, comprising the cos. Durham and Northumberland, with some other tracts, was long the richest bishopric in England; in 1843, its gross income was £2,416l., but its arrangements have been materially remodelled by the ecclesiastical commissioners, and the bishop's annual income fixed at £8,000l. Adjoining the cloisters are the deanery, library, chapter-house, prebendal college, and exchequer. The castle, a little N. of the cathedral, was founded by William the Conqueror, and contains apartments for the bishop, but is otherwise chiefly appropriated to the ecclesiastical university, incorporated in 1837, and which succeeded one existing from the time of Cromwell to the Restoration. Durham has 6 pa. churches, a Roman Catholic and various other chapels, an infirmary, alms-houses, and many other charitable institutions, public libraries, assembly rooms, and mechanics' institute. In the old town, on the N., are the market place, theatre, and principal shops; in Elvet the co. gaol and court-house. Manuf. hats, woollen stuffs, brass, and iron goods. The bor. is divided into 3 wards, and governed by a mayor, 6 aldermen, and 18 councillors. Corp. rev. 796l. Durham is the seat of co. assizes, bor. assizes, and sheriffs' courts, the palatine courts having been abolished. It is a polling-place for the co., and head of a poor-law union. It sends 2 mem. to House of Commons.

Length 680 m.; breadth 510 m. Area variously estimated from 212,000 to 225,000 sq. m. Pop. 668,000. Its W. part comprises the great chain of the Andes, which here attains nearly its highest elevation, in the summits of Chimborazo, Cotacachi, Antisana, and Cayambe. On the E. the country descends into the central plain of the continent, and is traversed by the upper course of the Amazon and its tributaries, the Putumayo, Napo, Pastaza, Manabí, Esmeraldas, and Ucayali. In 1833, the navigation of the rivers of the republic was declared free of all dues for 20 years. W of the Andes the Guayaquil, Esmeralda, and Mira rivers flow into the ocean. The temp of Quito and the more elevated table-lands, varies between 54° 2 and 61° 3 Fahr during the year. Mean annual temp 61°. In the low valleys the temp is much higher. Along the coast, from the Gulf of Guayaquil to Cape San Lorenzo, rain rarely or never falls. The valleys of Daqui and Guayaquil have regular rainy and dry seasons, and in the valley of the Amazon it rains almost daily, with excessive heat. Principal products are wheat, cacao, cotton, coffee, sugar, maize, yams, tobacco, corn, and fruits. In the S extremity of the Andes are extensive forests and the Cinciona bark tree is common; the plants yield wax, gum, resins, and sassafras. Tortles abound in the Amazon, and fish, especially the manta, are plentiful on the shores of the Pacific. Gold is abundant in the sands or almost all the rivers, and the contributions of the Indians of the interior are mostly paid in gold dust. Lead and quicksilver are also plentiful, but few, if any, mines are wrought. Sulphur is abundant near Chumborazo. Woolen cloths and cotton goods are manuf. Ecuador is divided into the depts Quito, Guayaquil and Azuay, principal cities and towns, Quito, the capital, Itoimba, Ambato, Baza, Huari, Otavalo, Puno Mayra, Cuenca, Loja, and Guayaquil, which last is the great emporium of the foreign trade. Ecuador much once formed part of the empire of the Incas, was discovered by Pizarro in 1532 and was held by the Spanish crown till 1812 when a revolution occurred which ended in the establishment of a free republic. In 1821, Simón Bolívar and Venezuela united and formed one republic, under the name of Colombia, but this union was dissolved in 1830, when the countries again separated and Ecuador declared itself from New Granada. The republic is governed by a president chosen for 8 years, a vice president, council of 8 senators, and house of representatives, with 1 member for every 4,000 inhabitants. The pop consists of the descendants in Spain, and of aboriginal Indians and Mestizos. There are very few negroes. In the W mountainous region the natives are Peruvians, and agriculturists and mechanics. The Indians of the plains are cattle hunters and fishers.

EDINBURGH, a city, parl. bor., and the metropolis of Scotland, is situated on the S. bank of the estuary of the Forth, in lat 55° 57' 3" N., lon. 3° 11' W., 392 m. N. of London. Pop. in 1801 (including Leith) 82,560. In 1861, of city and suburbs, 160,302. The city is picturesquely situated upon three ridges of hills. Elevation of High Street, at Tron Church, 263 feet; do. of Pinnex Street, at Register House, 217 feet. The old town occupies the more elevated ridge, which terminates on the W. by the bold rocky eminence of the Castle Hill (elevation 343 feet). Between the old and new town is a deep ravine, converted into gardens, and crossed on the E. by a bridge, and about the centre by an earthen mound. The new town extends to the N. of the old, and forms an extensive parallelogram, with wide and straight streets intersecting each other at right angles, and relieved at certain places by squares, a Circus, and a spacious octagon. To the S. of the old town extend the rural suburbs of Newington and Morningside. The principal feature in the old town is the High Street, which, with the Canongate, extends along the elevated ridge from the Castle on the W. to Holyrood Palace on the E., with narrow wynds or closes on each side. The houses in this part are lofty, and each storey is divided into distinct dwelling apartments or flats. In this line of streets are the High Church of St. Giles, built in the cathedral style, with a tower in the form of an imperial crown; the Tron Church; the Assembly Hall, with a spire 238½ feet high; the Parliament House, containing the old parliament hall, with oaken roof, built 1632, and the various courts of justice, advocates' and writers' libraries, and Royal Exchange. At the E. extremity of Canongate, in the valley between Arthur Seat and Calton Hill, are situated the abbey and palace of Holyrood, founded in 1138 by David I. The ruins of the choir of the ancient abbey remain; and the tower of the N.W. corner of the palace, built 1528 by James V., and containing Queen Mary's apartments, have been preserved and incorporated with the more modern buildings erected after the restoration in 1671. A statue of Queen Victoria stands in the area in front of the palace. The castle, built on a precipitous rock of basaltic greenstone, contains some ancient apartments, in one of which Queen Mary gave birth to James VI. of Scotland, afterwards James I. of England, the crown and regalia of Scotland, an armoury, and barracks for 2,000 soldiers. The university, founded 1580, by charter of James VI., is a noble institution. The building, commenced in 1789, forms a large quadrangle, with a court in the centre, and contains a library with 100,000 printed books and 310 MSS., museum and class rooms for the professors, who amount in number to 33, and who deliver courses of lectures on literature and sciences, theology, law, medicine, agriculture, and music. Annual average of students (since 1840) 1,636. There is also a Free Church College, and a Theological Hall of United Presbyterians. A college of physicians and of surgeons, with an anatomical museum; the Royal society, Highland and agricultural society, society of arts, antiquarian society, royal academy of painting; a botanic garden, philosophic institution, high school; naval and military academy, Edinburgh academy, a school of arts or Watt institution, school of design, and many private schools and institutions for the instruction of youth, united service and new clubs; an abattoir and a corn market. The most remarkable public buildings of the new town are the royal institution, adorned with a statue of Queen Victoria, and the Royal academy buildings; St. George and St. Andrew's churches, Melville monument, 139 feet high, Scott monument, astronomical observatory, general post-office and stamp-office. Edinburgh is divided into 17 par., and 13 quoad sacra par. Besides these there are 23 Free Church congregations, 15 United Presbyterian, 9 Episcopalian, 2 Roman Catholic chapels and a nunnery, 8 Independent, several Baptist, a Methodist, Society of Friends, and other churches. The charitable institutions are—for education and maintenance of children, the orphan hospital, George Heriot's hospital, founded 1634, with many out-door school, in which poor children are educated gratis; George Watson's hospital, John Watson's institution, the merchant maidens, trades maidens, and orphan hospitals, Dossidon's hospital, Stewart's hospital, Gilchrist's hospital for adults, an asylum for the blind, deaf-mute institution, a royal infirmary, receiving from 3,000 to 4,000 patients annually, and several public dispensaries; night asylum for the houseless poor, and house of refuge. There are 3 poor's houses and 2 ragged schools connected with the city and suburbs. There are 9 banks, besides a savings' bank. Cattle silk mill manuf., British tapestry and velvet, employing from 300 to 400 hands. Coach-building, fine glass making, and ale brewing, are its chief manufs. It holds a high place as a printing and publishing centre. There are 12 newspapers published in the city, 1 of which appears three times a week, and 6 twice a week; several quarterly reviews, monthly magazines, literary, scientific, religious, and medical, and various other periodical works. Edinburgh is the central point where the great lines of railway meet, and a part of the new town is traversed by a tunnel of the Northern Railway. The elevated situation of the city allows of free ventilation; and an abundant supply of water is brought from the Pentland hills, 8 m S.W. Mean temperature of the year 47°. Fahr.; mean of summer heat 67°. 2, winter 38°. 4. Annual fall of rain 24 inches. The climate of Edinburgh is salubrious, and is comparatively dry and mild. Arthur Seat, in its immediate vicinity, in the middle of the Royal Park, is 822 feet above the sea. In the vicinity there are 6 cemeteries.

The city is governed by a Lord Provost, elected for 3 years, who is also high sheriff of the county, lord lieutenant of co. of the city, and admiral of Firth of Forth, and has precedence of all official persons within his jurisdiction, 4 bailies, a dean of guild, treasurer, and council; in all, 33. There is a gildry, a merchant company, and 14 incorporated trades. The city is divided into 5 wards. It sends 2 members to House of Commons. Reg. electors 6,827. Annual revenue of city about 25,000*l*. The court of session, or supreme civil and criminal court for Scotland, is composed of 13 judges, 6 of whom sit as lords ordinary, to decide causes in the first instance, and 4 sit in each of the two divisions of the inner house. The court of justiciary is composed of the Lord Justice-General, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and 5 lords commissioners. The faculty of advocates (barristers), consists of advocates who have the privilege of pleading causes before the court of session. The advocates' library contains 148,000 printed volumes, and 2,000 MSS. The society of writers to the signet, who have also a large library, practise as agents or attorneys before the court of session. The solicitors is another society who practise before the supreme courts, but with inferior privileges to the W.S. There are also the sheriff court, and justice of peace court. The Register House, an elegant building E. end of Princes Street, erected in 1774, with an equestrian statue of Wellington in front, contains the public records, and records of landed property, for Scotland, under the direction of the lord register and clerks of court of session. The police establishment and society of high constables, form an effective protection for the peace of the city. The prisons for the city and co. are situated on S. side of the Calton Hill.

Samson of Durham, writing in the year 854, mentions the fortress or castle under the name of Edinburgum, or castle of Edwin, probably so called after Edwin, Prince of Northumberland. In 1192 the town received a charter from David

1. In 1315, Alexander II., son of William the Lion, held a parliament here for the first time. After this it frequently became the residence of the Kings of Scotland, and latterly the permanent seat of the Scottish parliament, courts of justice, and executive government.

EDINBURGHSHIRE or MID-LOTHIAN, is situated in the eastern part of the S. division of Scotland, bounded on the N. by the Firth of Forth, on the E. by Haddington and Berwick shires, S. by Peebles and Selkirk shires, and W. by Linlithgowshire. Extreme length W. to E. 38 m.; average breadth 15 m. Area 366 sq. m., or 229,120 ac. Pop. 250,435. The S.E. part of the co. is intersected by the Moorfoot hills, a branch of the Lammermoors, of greywacke or lower silurian formation. From the S.W., the Pentland range runs towards the N.E., composed of porphyry, while the greenstone hills of Corstorphine extend from the Firth of Forth S.W., and are continued by the greenstone and basaltic elevations of the castle rock, Arthur Seat, and Calton, in the vicinity of the capital. Carnethy, the most elevated of the Pentland range, is 1,800 feet above the sea. From the S. the co. gradually slopes towards the borders of the Firth, and on the E. and W. extends into level and fertile plains. The principal rivers, none of which are large, are the Water of Leith, flowing along the N.W. derelict of the Pentlands, till it joins the Firth at Leith. The Esk, originating in two branches N. and S., in the southern part of the same mountain range, uniting to the E. of Dalkeith, and joining the sea at Musselburgh. The Almond, flowing through the N.W. valley of the co., and the Tyne, rising in the Moorfoot hills, and flowing E. into Haddingtonshire. The greater part of the co. belongs to the coal formation, and coal is extensively wrought. A bed about 15 m. in length and 8 m. in breadth, extends across the district from Carlops to Musselburgh, containing 33 seams, from 0 inches to 6 feet thick, partly horizontal and partly edge. Sandstone of a very superior quality abounds, and is extensively quarried at Dalkeith, Granton, and Hailes. Limestone is found in many localities, especially at Gilmerton, Crichton, and Burdighouse. Slight indications of lead and copper have been noticed, but no metal is wrought except iron, which exists as ironstone in the coal strata. The co. is chiefly agricultural, and farming is conducted on the best modern principles. In the vicinity of the metropolis, extensive nurseries and vegetable and fruit gardens are established. There are extensive paper mills on the Esk and Water of Leith, and several distilleries, breweries, potteries, but no other manufs. of importance. The Edinburgh and Glasgow, North British, and Caledonian, and Edinburgh and Northern Railways, traverse the co. Edinburgh, the cap., is the only royal burgh. Dalkeith is a burgh of barony, and Musselburgh a burgh of regality. Principal villa, Portobello, Newhaven, Leaswade, Loanhead, Ratho, Ponicak, and Roslin. Leith is the principal seaport, and Granton is a low-water pier for steam-boats. The co. (exclusive of Edinburgh and suburbs) contains 29 par. and 5 uninc. towns do. It sends 1 member to House of Commons. Reg. elects. (1845) 4,166. Polling-place, Edinburgh, Dalkeith, and Mid-Caldor. Mid-Lothian and the surrounding districts, at the period of the Roman conquest, was formed into the prov. of Vallonia. The country was subsequently occupied by Saxon invaders from the N. of England, and by them chiefly retained till about the year 1000, when the Lothians were ceded to the Scottish monarch, Malcolm I.

N., $100^{\circ} 28'$ and 36° E.; bounded N. by the Mediterranean, E. by the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea, S. by Nubia, and W. by Barbary and the Sahara. Length, N. to S., 500 m. Area uncertain. Pop. estim. (1856) 3,894,000. Cap. Cairo. The territory of Egypt is composed of a long narrow valley, enclosed by a double range of hills, which extend from Assuan to Cairo, and traversed by the Nile. N. of Cairo, where the mountains terminate, the Nile separates into numerous branches, of which the two principal flow, the one N.E., and the other N.W., to the Mediterranean, enclosing a triangular space, having the sea for its base, and called the Delta from its resemblance to the Greek letter Δ . These mountain chains, which defend the valley of the Nile from the sands of the surrounding desert, rise to a height of about 2,000 feet in the vicinity of Thebes, in many places they are merely low hills stretching into the desert. (In the E. of the Nile the range terminates abruptly in Jebel Mokketan, near Cairo, and runs E. towards the Isthmus of Suez. On the E. of the Nile the desert is mountainous, and traversed by ravines and valleys, the most remarkable of which form the caravan routes between Cairo and Suez, and between Kenneh and Cosseir. The desert of Libya contains many oases, which owe their fertility to the lowness of their situation, enabling them to retain moisture. In the N. of the Libyan desert are two contiguous valleys, enclosed by branches of the W. mountains, in one of which, called the "valley of the Natron Lakes," are found small pools, which in winter exude a liquid of a violet-red colour, to the height of 6 or 8 feet. This, when evaporated by the sun's heat, leaves the substance called natron, a mixture of marine salt and sulphate of soda. The principal lakes are Birket-el-Keroun or Lake Moeris, in Middle Egypt, and Mareotis, Boutlos, and Menzaleh, in Lower Egypt, which last are shallow lagoons, separated from the Mediterranean by narrow peninsulas of sand. The geology of Egypt comprises granite in the district of the Cataract, from Philae to Syene, sandstone from Syene to Kenneh, and limestone from Kenneh to the Delta. The climate of Egypt is extremely dry, which is evinced by the perfect preservation of the columns and sculptured surfaces of its temples. There are but two seasons, the temperate, which lasts from October to March, and the hot, from March to September. The heat, during the day, is excessive in summer, owing to the confined position of the country, and the lowness of its surface, but the nights are cool. In winter the weather is mild. At Cairo, lat. $30^{\circ} 3'$ N., the mean temp. of the year is 72° , winter 56° , summer 85° F., Fahr., and at Kenneh, lat. $26^{\circ} 10'$ N., mean temp. of year 74° , winter 60° , summer 92° Fahr. Upper and Middle Egypt are more healthy than the Delta. On the subiding of the inundation of the Nile, fevers, dysentery, and ophthalmia prevail. N. and N.W. winds blow during the progress of the sun towards the tropic of Cancer, but, on its return to the tropic of Capricorn, it varies between S.E. and W. During the spring equinox, the country is visited by the pestilential wind called the Sirocco or Khamsin, a hot S.E. wind of 30 days' duration, when the diseases peculiar to the country assume their greatest virulence. The maraga occurs on the plains after the surface has been heated by the sun, on which occasion the country appears like a vast lake studded with islands. Rain is unknown in Upper Egypt; in the Delta it falls frequently from November to March. Showers are slight and infrequent at Cairo, yet in 1824 rain fell continuously for 6 days, and caused the destruction of several houses. During the French scientific expedition, the number of rainy days was 15, and the latest observations give 18 in a year in Lower Egypt. Fogs are rare, but very dense when they do occur. Snow never falls except in the vicinity of the coast, and then in very small quantity. In 1835 snow fell at Alexandria, Rosetta, and Assiut, to the amazement of the inhabitants, to whom the phenomenon was totally unknown. With the exception of the oases, the fertility of Egypt is confined to the valley inundated by the Nile, in the Delta, and a space of from 5 to 25 m. on the banks of the river, in Middle and Upper Egypt. The soil is composed of successive deposits of earth brought down by the river, and enveloping the sands of the desert. The Nile regularly inundates its valley for several months in the year. This periodic inundation commences in June, and attains its maximum height in September. After having remained stationary for several days, the waters subside, and disappear at the end of November. The distribution of the water is favoured by the slightly convex form of the central valley of the Nile, and is assisted by lateral canals. On the left or W. side of the river, the chief of these is the canal of Joseph, which feeds the ancient Lake Moeris, at the bottom of the fertile valley of Fayoum. As a potable water, that of the Nile is reckoned the best in the world. Egypt has no metals, and the only minerals are natron, salt-petre, salt, marble, and the celebrated red granite called "Syene marble," employed in the construction of the pyramids, and in many of the monuments of Italy; the principal quarries are situated in the mountains of Upper Egypt. Emeralds are found in the mountains on the shores of the Red Sea, but the mines are abandoned. The cultivation of the soil is divided into that of the low grounds, or those watered naturally, and the high grounds, which depend for their productiveness on artificial inundations; the greater part of Upper Egypt is thus watered, and many means have been employed to facilitate the process. In ancient times Lake Moeris was formed for a reservoir, and a complete barrage of the Nile, lately effected, is expected greatly to augment the fertility of the soil. The plants peculiar to Egypt comprise the lotus, the papyrus (from which the first substance used for writing upon was made), the zizyphus, and many aromatic plants. The date palm flourishes to the lat. of Thebes, and on its fruit many of the inhabitants of Upper Egypt depend for nourishment. Egypt has from the remotest ages been considered one of the most fertile countries in the world. The chief cultivated plants are cotton, lint, hemp, indigo, sugar, tobacco, opium; the principal grains are millet, maize, wheat, and rice. Durrah (Sorghum vulgare) forms a chief article of nourishment. The cereal of Egypt have always been celebrated, and onions, melons, cucumbers, are extensively used. The vine, widely cultivated in ancient times—extirpated by the Mussulmans—has been reintroduced, and its cultivation actively promoted by the late Mehemet Ali. The fruit trees comprise those of tropical countries; those of Europe do not flourish; numerous plantations of mulberries have been made by Mehemet Ali; there are no forests; and sycamores and palms are thinly distributed. Among wild animals are the hippopotamus, crocodile, ichneumon, jerboa, and the fox; domestic animals comprise the ox and buffalo, horse, ass, mule, camel, and donkey. Among birds are the

Nile, celebrated in antiquity, the vulture, pelican, plover, bittern, and quail, which arrive in great flocks from the interior of Africa. The raising of fowls, pigeons, and bees, is an important branch of industry among the peasantry, who hatch eggs by means of artificial heat. Fish is abundant in the lakes of the Delta and in the Nile, the salmon of which is excellent. Reptiles are numerous, and sponges, coral, the papyrus, and madrepores, are found on the shores of the Red Sea. The manufactures of Egypt are almost entirely monopolized by the Government. Carpets are made at Bensouef, red caps at Foush, and firearms and military accoutrements at Cairo. [BOULAC—CAIRO] The principal manufactures of the natives are of woollen clothes, pottery-ware, and carpets. The trade with Europe is carried on through Alexandria. The total annual value of exports estimated at 1,813,826*l*, imports at 2,470,966*l*. The traffic with the interior of Africa is carried on by means of caravans, which bring, in exchange for European and Egyptian products, iron, gold dust, skins, wool, gum, ostrich feathers and metals (the slave market of Cairo was abolished in 1846). The chief commercial relations with Arabia and India are carried on by Cosmer and Suez. Since the establishment of regular steam packets in the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean, Egypt has become the route to India for all the correspondence of Europe, as well as for the greater portion of travellers. The principal means of communication are the Nile, which is traversed by steam packets and the canals, many of which have been repaired by Mehemet Ali, but even the best of them are often in navigable during a great part of the year. A railway from Alexandria to Cairo (130 miles in length) is in operation, and another of 76 miles, completing the overland route, is now (1843) open to Suez. Egypt was one of the earliest civilized countries in the world. And it is believed that a colony of Ethiopians first introduced a form of religion, and the art of cultivating the soil. The empire was greatly extended under Sesostris and Rameses, it was subjugated by Cambyzes, King of Persia, 525 B. C. At that time it was occupied by a numerous population, had numerous cities and monuments of astonishing grandeur—of which the pyramids still exist,—the obelisks, many of which were carried to Rome and Paris, and numerous temples and palaces. For 24 centuries it has been subjected to foreign domination, and has fallen successively into misery and ignorance. It was taken by Alexander the Great in 332, after his death it formed a separate kingdom under the Ptolemies, till the year 30 A. C. Augustus then reduced it to a Roman province. The Mohammedan Arabians seized it in the 7th century. The Caliphs possessed it for 2 centuries. In 1250 it came into the power of the Mamelukes, who were subjected to the Turks at the commencement of the 16th century. The French overran it in 1798, in 1802 they were driven from it by the British, and in 1811 Mehemet Ali rendered himself master of the country by the massacre of the Mamelukes. By judicious government and great reforms, Egypt, under the late Mehemet Ali, made rapid progress in civilization, he added to his territory Nubia, Kordofan, and part of Abyssinia, and had also extended his dominion over Syria, Crete, and part of Arabia, but in 1840 he was deprived of all his Asiatic possessions. By the treaty of London, 1841, the government is hereditary among the descendants of Mehemet Ali. Egypt comprises the provinces of Said or Upper Egypt, Vostani or Middle Egypt, and Bahari or Lower Egypt. These are divided into 7 intendancies, which are subdivided into departments and circles. Besides the governors of these divisions, the Fellahs have preserved their hereditary sheiks. The highest tribunals are those of the cadis, inferior causes are judged without appeal by the magistrates. In the absence of an official census, the following estimate of the pop is based on a recent official return of the number of houses, allowing 8 persons to each house in Cairo, and 4 for the rest of the country.—Egyptian Musulmans, 2,800,000 do Copts, 150,000, Omani Turks, 12,000, Bedwin Arabs, 70,000, Barbaras, 5,000, Negroes, 20,000, Abyssinians, 5,000, Circassian and Georgian slaves, 5,000, Jews, 7,000, Syrians, 6,000, Armenians, 2,000, Greeks, 5,000, Europeans domiciled in Egypt, about 8,500. The chief cities are Cairo and Alexandria. The largest pyramids are near Gizeh, 7 m S W Cairo, but others occur at intervals on an l near the l b of the Nile, over a space of 70 m, the greatest temples and sculptures are found on the site of Thebes, and at I diou, Denderah, etc. The chief establishment of public instruction is the University of El-Agha at Cairo. Mehemet Ali established schools of medicine, languages, and agriculture—military and naval schools. Most of the primary schools and the libraries are dependent on the mosques. The Egyptian army is raised by conscription. In 1838 the army consisted of—infantry, 12,000, cavalry, 4,500, artillery, 1,500, engineers, 500, and a regiment of negroes in Sudan. The fleet consists of 7 line of battle ships, 6 frigates, 4 corvettes, 7 brigs, 2 steam packets, and 23 transports. The public revenue in 1835 amounted to 760,000 piastres, of 5*l* each, expenditure 700,000 piastres, debt 6 to 7 millions = 3,000,000 to 35,000,000 francs. The revenue is chiefly derived from land, capitation taxes, and from the Pacha's monopoly on raw and manufactured goods.

ENGLAND (French Angleterre), with Wales, forms the southern and most important portion of the island of Great Britain, extending between lat. 50° and 55° 45' N., lon. 1° 45' E. and 5° 44' W., bounded N. by Scotland, E. the German Ocean, S. the English Channel, and W. the Atlantic Ocean and the Irish Sea. Length from Berwick to the Land's End 425 m.; breadth 60 to 300 m. Surface greatly diversified. In the S.E. peninsula the Cornish Highlands extend in a N.E. direction, and are succeeded on the E. by the Dartmoor hills, 1,800 feet, the Dorset hills, 900 feet, and the North and South Downs sloping E. to the Wealden heights, 315 feet in elevation, and terminating in the North Foreland. From Dartmoor the Exmoor heights, the Mendip and Cotswold hills (1,100 feet), extend N., separating the basins of the Thames and Severn, and enclosing Salisbury Plain. From the N. bank of the Thames the Chiltern hills and the Eastern hills divide the eastern plain from the basin of the Ouse and the fen districts. In all this region, S. of the Wash and E. of the Severn, the hills are mostly isolated, and none of these attain a height of 2,000 feet. W. of the Severn the country is occupied by the Cambrian mountains and their offshoots (Wales). Near the centre of England is the Peak of Derby, on the Pennine chain, which extends in a N.N.W. direction, separating the basins of the Trent and the Mersey, and terminating on the N. between the Tyne and the Eden. Its highest points are Fountains (2,270 feet), Ingleboro (2,301 feet), Wharfedale (2,884 feet), and Crossfell, 2,001 feet above the sea. Connected with the Pennine chain on the N.W. are the Cambrian mountains, comprising Skiddaw (3,022 feet), Helvellyn (3,055 feet), and Scawfell, 3,166 feet above the sea. The declivity of the mountains is in general steep towards the W., but sloping gently towards the E. The Great central plain is bounded by the Thames on the S., the Severn on the W., and the Ouse on the E. On the N. it is separated by the Trent from the plain of York, which latter is connected with the low coast lands extending to Berwick. The coast line of England is extremely irregular, and deeply indented with bays, forming natural harbours, affording safe anchorage, and protected by a great number of prominent capes and headlands. Of its rivers, 50 are navigable, but in general only for a short distance from the sea. The four principal are—the Thames, Humber, Severn, and Mersey. On the S. coast, the Tamar, Exe, and Avon contribute their waters to the English Channel; on the E. coast, the Thames, Yare, Great Ouse, Witham, Humber, Tees, Tyne, and Tweed, flow to the German Ocean; on the W. coast, the Severn, Towy, and Parrot, flow into the Bristol Channel, and the Dee (in Wales), the Mersey, Ribble, and Eden, to the Irish Sea. The geological structure of England and Wales, commencing on the W., consists of the Silurian system of rocks, composed of limestone, flint, and sandstone. To this succeeds the Devonian or old red sandstone, which prevails through the co. of Hereford, Monmouth, Devon, and Cornwall. The western part of England commencing at Bewick, has a base of carboniferous limestone in N which extends S and W., with some interruptions, into Devonshire, and contains the principal lead mines. Above this lie the coal formations, commencing in Northumberland, and extending through Durham, York, Lancashire, and Staffordshire, into South Wales. Above the coal deposits lie the new red sandstone and magnesian limestone, in some localities abounding in salt and gypsum. East of the coal and sandstone districts is a waving line from Whitby to the coast of Dorset, extending the Lias and Oolite. These are succeeded eastward by green sand and chalk, and the Wealden beds of Sussex. Tertiary (Cenozoic) and tertiary formations constitute the Kent, and Suffolk districts and basin of the Thames and South Hampshire [BRITAIN, CONTINENTAL, WALSLEY].

The prevailing wind for the summer, autumn, and part of winter, is S W and W. In spring and other portions of the year, dry and scoreless E and N E winds are common. The rainfall in summer and autumn. The greatest annual amount of rain falls in Cumberland (amounting to 50 inches), and in the W coast generally. The least annual amount on the E coast is from 20 to 25 inches. Mean annual fall at 100 places 31 inches. Mean temperature winter 40°, summer 60° S. (see 40°), Fahr.

Fishes and farms vary greatly in size but throughout the greater part of the country land property is very much divided. In 1861 the net amount of the property was 1,000,000,000 of which 1,000,000,000 was agriculture. Agriculture has attained great superiority throughout England. Generally though in many districts particularly in the W, it is backward. Wheat is the principal crop, especially in the E and S F co. barley is raised chiefly in the central co., and oats in the N, though they are cultivated more or less in all parts of the country. Peas, beans, potatoes, and turnips, are the crops most in importation. Rice and buckwheat are only partially cultivated. Rye, flax, hemp and mangel wurzel, are also cultivated in certain parts. Hops are raised chiefly to Kent, Herefordshire, and the vicinity of Faversham in Surrey and their average annual produce is estimated at 30,000,000 lbs. As regards the large towns the land is commonly laid out in kitchen gardens, and in Bedfordshire an extensive district is appropriated to raising vegetables for the London markets. In the S W co., large quantities of apples are grown, and Devon and Hereford are famous for their cyder. Perry is made chiefly in Worcestershire, and mead in many of the co. contiguous to Wales. The grape does not flourish so as to produce wine, beer and ale being universally the popular beverages which supply its place.

A full half of the cultivable lands are estimated to be in meadows and pasturage, and hay forms an important crop for which Middlesex and the adjacent co. are famous. The stock of horses in England and Wales has been estimated at 1,000,000, 2/3 of which are employed in farm labour. Horned cattle are estimated at 4,000,000, 1/4 of which stock is annually slaughtered; of these the Lancashire, Holderness, Northumberland, Durham, Devon, Hereford, Sussex, and Suffolk, are the chief breeds; in addition to which, many have of late been introduced from

Guernsey, Alderney, etc. Butter is an important product in Essex, Cambridgeshire, and Dorset. Cheese in Cheshire, Gloucester, Wilt, Leicestershire, and Devonshire. The number of sheep has been estimated at 26,000,000. The long-woolled comprise the Romney-mare, Tees-water, Lincoln, and New Leicester breeds; and the short woolled, the South Down, Dorset, Wilt, and Hereford. Total annual produce of wool in England has been estimated at 470,000 packs, of 240 lbs. each (nearly of 1,000,000 cwt). Hops are very generally kept, and are numerous in the forest lands of Here, Berks, Gloucester, and Hereford, the former of which co. is famous for bacon. Geese are reared in large numbers in Lincolnshire partly for the sake of their quills. Many other kinds of poultry are also common. England is generally well wooded, and 62,620 ac. of royal forest land is enclosed for the growth of timber. The New Forest in Hampshire, the forest of Sherwood (Notts), Dean (Gloucestershire), are among the largest of the forest-tracts, but the chief supplies are derived from the construction of the royal navy grows to the greatest perfection in the woods of Sussex, Surrey, and Kent, and it comprises all the country between the North and South Downs and many parts of which have remained densely wooded ever since the Roman period. The fisheries, though they have never been chief sources of national wealth are highly important in some localities. In the North Sea, the herring fishery is that principally pursued, and about 100,000 smacks of from 40 to 50 tons burden are annually employed from Yarmouth, which has an extensive trade in herrings. The towns of Sunderland, Whitby, Scarborough, and Harwich are also interested in the same trade. On the coasts of Devon and Cornwall, many of the poor are employed during summer in the pilchard fishery. Cod, mackerel, soles, flounders, salmon in some of the estuaries, and oysters, are the other fish of most importance taken in the British sea. At many of the ports, ships are fitted out for whale fisheries in the N and S oceans, and these employ many thousands of seafaring men. England is greatly indebted for the high rank she holds in her extended commercial wealth to the abundant supply of coals obtained in Lancashire, West Yorkshire, Northumberland, Durham, Staffordshire and Warwickshire, have rendered the co. the seat of the largest and most flourishing manufacturing world. For statement of coal and iron see BRITAIN. Tin is procured only in Cornwall and Devon, and copper is almost confined to that region, the product of the former is estimated at 4,500 tons, and that of the latter at 15,000 tons. Lead is raised in Somerset, Devonshire, and Cumberland. The total quantity obtained annually in England and Wales is estimated at 50,000 tons, from which silver to the value of about 30,000£ is usually extracted. Plumbago is found in the greatest purity at Borrowdale in Cumberland, and some of inferior quality in Devonshire, where also asparagus is raised. Zinc, nickel, arsenic, alum, salt from beds and springs in Cheshire and Worcestershire, pottery clay in Staffordshire and Cornwall, lime, freestone and granite, are among the most valuable minerals. By far the most important manufactures are those of cotton goods, the great seat of which is South Lancashire. The woollen manufactures are chiefly seated in West Yorkshire, especially at and around Leeds, Wakefield, Huddersfield, Halifax, Bradford, and Dewsbury, also in the co. Lancaster, Cumberland, Gloucester, Wilt, Devon, and Somerset. In Lancashire stocking-weaving

ing is carried on; and Norwich has trade in worsteds, and is the principal seat of the crape manufacture. The manufacture of linens is carried on principally in Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, and Dorset; and that of silks in London (Spitalfields) and at Manchester, Macclesfield, and Coventry, in which last town ribbons are chiefly woven. The foregoing manufactures are now mostly wrought with the aid of steam.

Next in importance to the manufacture of woven fabrics is that of hardware. The more ponderous iron machinery is wrought in Shropshire, Staffordshire, in the vicinity of Birmingham, and in the naval dockyards. Sheffield, London, and Birmingham, are the principal seats of the manufacture of cutlery. Watch and clock works are made in Lancashire; leather gloves at Worcester, Yeovil, and Woodstock; boots and shoes in the cos. Northampton and Stafford; and the leather manuf. is estimated to employ in all nearly 234,000 hands. Earthenwares manufactured in the potteries of N.W. Staffordshire; china wares in Derbyshire and Worcestershire; and glass wares chiefly in the northern counties. Paper, hats, bricks, tiles, soap, gunpowder, chemical wares, and straw-plait, are among the other articles of manufacture. Extensive sugar refineries, distilleries, and breweries, are established in all the larger commercial towns; and the London breweries are estimated to supply annually from 1,800,000 to 2,000,000 barrels of porter. Ship-building is a most extensive and important branch of industry; the largest ships of the line are built at the great dockyards of Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Chatham; and others at the yards of Sheerness and Deptford. Mercantile vessels of large burden are chiefly built in or near London, Liverpool, Sunderland, Newcastle, Hull, Yarmouth, Bristol, Southampton, and Cowes. Internal communication is effected by numerous navigable canals, and in every direction by good turnpike roads; but both these means of traffic have been in a great part superseded by a series of railways, which already extend like a net-work over the greater part of the kingdom. In 1838 there were 8,700 miles of railway in operation in England and Wales; and on most of the lines of railway telegraphic wires were erected. The gross custom duties received at all the ports of England in 1846, amounted to 18,138,790*l.*; and the shipping registered as owned at the same ports in 1832, consisted of 18,627 sailing vessels; and 973 steam-vessels.

England, in the early middle ages, composed a heptarchy of 7 kingdoms—viz., Kent, Sussex, Wessex, Essex, Northumbria, East Anglia, including the S.E. cos., and Mercia, embracing the Midland cos. These provinces, under the Saxon monarchy, have, with a few exceptions, long been obsolete; but ecclesiastically, the country is divided into the two provs. or archbishoprics of Canterbury and York. The former of these, comprising all the country S. of the Don and Humber, is subdivided into the sees of Canterbury, London, Winchester, Lichfield, Lincoln, Ely, Salisbury, Exeter, Bath and Wells, Chichester, Norwich, Worcester, Hereford, Rochester, Oxford, Peterboro', and Gloucester, together with the four Welsh bishoprics; and the province of York comprises the see of that city, with those of Durham, Carlisle, Chester, Ripon, and the Isle of Man. There are 10,718 parishes or parochial benefices, the incumbents of which enjoy an aggregate revenue of about 3,250,000*l.* annually. In 1851, the total number of places of worship was 34,467, providing 10,212,568 sittings, of these the Church of England supplied 5,317,915, and all the other denominations 4,894,648 sittings, and the number of children attending school was 1,754,812. The cos. are territorial divisions, some of which were established during the heptarchy. In each are a lord-lieutenant, and one or more sheriffs appointed by the Crown, a variable number of magistrates commissioned by royal authority to act as justices of the peace, and one or more coroners, elected by the commonalty. Besides parishes, the cos. are generally subdivided into hundreds and tithings, and pa. unions; in addition, Sussex is divided into rapes, Kent into lathes, Lincoln into parts, the extreme N. cos. into wards, and York-hire into wapentakes and ridings, all of which are more extensive divisions than those previously named. Cities and boroughs are governed by their own corporations, which, since the Municipal Reform Act, have consisted of a mayor and a variable number of aldermen, and three times their number of councillors or burgesses, elected by the different borough wards. The cities of London, Bristol, Canterbury, Coventry, Exeter, Gloucester, Lichfield, Lincoln, Norwich, Worcester, and York, and the towns, Hull, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Nottingham, Poole, and Southampton, are cos. of themselves, and participate in the regulations applying to counties in the election of representatives to Parliament. EUROPOS CHANHEL, Greece. [ΕΥΡΩΠΑ]

EUROPE, Europe, the smallest, but most civilized, and, in proportion to its extent, the most densely peopled of the five great divisions of the globe; forms a peninsular prolongation of Asia, from which it is separated on the E. by the river

Kara, the Ural mountains and river, and the Caspian Sea; and on the S. by the mountain chain of Caucasus. On all other sides it is bounded by seas, bays, gulfs, and straits; these are, on the N. the Arctic Ocean, W. the Atlantic, and S. the Strait of Gibraltar, the Mediterranean, the Sea of Marmara, and the Black Sea. The continental portion of Europe is comprised between lat. 36° and 71° 12' N., lon. 0° 30' W. and 60° 50' E. Area estimated at 3,768,000 sq. m., 3-4ths of which is occupied by plains, and 1-4th by mountains and high lands. The peninsulas comprise 1-4th, and the islands 1-31st of the whole extent.

One of the great characteristics of this quarter of the globe, is the vast number of inland seas and estuaries by which it is intersected, and the immense extent of coast line (17,000 m.), which in consequence it enjoys. The principal peninsulas thus formed are in the N.; Scandinavia, between the Baltic Sea and the Atlantic Ocean; Jütland, between the Baltic and the German Ocean; the peninsula of Brittany, between the English Channel and the Bay of Biscay. In the S., the Iberian peninsula (Spain and Portugal), between the Mediterranean and the Atlantic Ocean; the Italian peninsula, between the Adriatic and the Tyrrhenian Sea; the Hellenic peninsula (Greece and Turkey), E. of Italy; and the Crimea in the N. of the Black Sea. The principal islands are in the German Ocean, the British Isles, the largest in Europe. In the Arctic Ocean, Novaya Zemlia. In the Mediterranean Sea and its branches, Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, Malta, Elba, and the Balearic Islands. The islands of Greece, Crete or Candia, the Ionian Islands, and the islands of Dalmatia. The Baltic includes numerous islands, the chief of which are Zealand, Fühnen, and Laland, Rugen, Bornholm, Oeland, Gothland, and the archipelago of Stockholm. Most of the rivers of Europe belong to two great basins, that of the Atlantic and its branches on the W., and the Mediterranean on the S.; the line of separation, which follows the direction S.W. to N.E., is elevated on the W., where it is formed by the Sierra Nevada, part of the Pyrenees, the Cevennes and the Vosges mountains; it meets the Alps near the sources of the Rhine and Rhône. After cutting the Carpathians on the N. of Hungary, the watershed traverses Russia, where its elevation is very inconsiderable. On the E. and S.E., the Volga and its affluents contribute their waters to the Caspian Sea, and on the N.E. the Dvina flows to the Arctic Ocean. A great part of North Germany, Denmark, the Netherlands, and part of Belgium are plains, little elevated above the level of the sea; the great plains of Russia and Poland have a mean height of 500 feet, the other countries of Europe are traversed by chains of mountains, the chief of which are the Scandinavian Alps in Sweden and Norway, the Carpathians and their counterparts, the Sudetic mountains in Germany; the Balkan mountains, the Dinaric Alps, and the chain of Pindus in Turkey; the Alps between Italy, France, Switzerland, and Germany; the Apennines in Italy, the Jura between France and Switzerland, the Cevennes and the mountains of Auvergne in France, the Pyrenees between France and Spain, the Iberian and the Cantabrian mountains, the Sierra Estrella, the mountains of Toledo, the Sierra Morena, and the Sierra Nevada in Spain. The principal summits of the different chains are, in the Alps, Mont Blanc, the culminating point of Europe, 15,744 feet, Monte Rosa 15,174 feet. In the Pyrenees, Malhita, 11,168 feet. In the Sierra Nevada, the peak of Mulhagen, 11,660 feet. The mountains of Great Britain cover the N. and W. parts of the island; their general direction corresponds with that of the Scandinavian mountains, and like them also the W. sides are abrupt, and broken up by numerous gulls, while they slope gradually to the E. shores. The principal chains are the Grampians and the Cheviots, and the culminating point is Ben Nevis, 4,366 feet above the sea. The islands of Sardinia and Corsica are traversed by a small chain of mountains, interrupted by the Strait of Bonifacio, culminating point Mont Rotondo in Corsica, 8,767 feet. Sicily is traversed by a chain of mountains, separated from the Apennines by the Strait of Messina, culminating point Mount Etna, 10,874 feet in elevation above the sea. Some of these mountain chains contain numerous extinct volcanoes, but the volcanoes of Etna, Vesuvius, Heckla, and Stromboli are still in a state of activity.

Europe is every where well watered. The most important rivers are the Volga, Don, Dnieper, Danube, Po, Rhône, Ebro, Tagus, Garonne, Loire, Seine, Meuse, Rhine, Elbe, Oder, Vistula, and Drina. Lakes abound in Sweden, the N.W. of Russia, Switzerland, Hungary, and Italy. The most remarkable are Wener, Wetter, Mälär in Sweden; Ladoga and Onega in Russia; Lemán, Lucerne, and Zurich in Switzerland; Constance between Switzerland and Germany; Nensiedl and Balaton in Hungary; Maggiore, Como, and Garda in North Italy.

The climate of continental Europe presents the most striking contrasts, but it is in general temperate, and exempt from the extremes of heat and cold to which the other great divisions of the globe are exposed. This is partly owing to the seas by which it is surrounded, and partly to the gulf stream, the heated atmosphere from which is carried by the prevailing S.W. winds to the W. shores of Europe. The numerous inland seas, lakes, and rivers which intersect it, soften the atmosphere, and induce a humidity favourable to vegetation. South of the parallel of lat. 45° N., extreme cold is rare, and of short duration, while the heat is tempered by the mountains which cover this portion of Europe; but the southern coasts frequently suffer from the hot wind of Africa, the Sirocco, which is occasionally arrested only at the foot of the Alps. The great plain of the N.E. being exposed to N. winds from the Arctic Ocean, has a much more severe climate than the other countries of Europe. The lower limit of perpetual snow in Europe lies in the Alps and Pyrenees, an elevation of 8,000 feet; and, in the interior of Norway, 4,000 to 5,000 feet. The soil of the different countries of Europe is, on the whole, fertile, and produces all the vegetable substances of temperate climates. In the peninsula of the S., where the vegetation resembles that of the tropics, the sugar cane, the cotton plant, the orange, citron, fig, pomegranate, vine, rice, and tobacco are cultivated, and the trees comprise the chestnut, oak, and pine. In the central regions, comprising France, Switzerland, and the valleys of the Rhine, Elbe, Danube, and Theiss, and on the shores of the Black and Caspian Seas, the vine is cultivated with success; the orchards supply the walnut, peach, apricot, apple, and pear; wheat, rye, and in some places tobacco and maize, are cultivated; the poplar is common; the chestnut is rare, and the forests comprise the oak, beech, and fir. In the British islands, and the greater part of lower Europe, valuable grain is cultivated, and the forests produce the oak, beech, birch, and pine. In the North of Europe, barley and oats are cultivated as far as lat. 60° N. in Lapland, and the forests produce the pine and the birch; the North of Russia is incapable of producing any kind of grain.

The fauna of Europe is less varied than that of the other continents of the old world, but is rich in useful animals, and exempt from the noxious species common to Asia and Africa. The horse, cow, ass, sheep, goat, pig, and dog are distributed nearly all over the continent; the buffalo feeds in the marshy plains of Italy, Wallachia, and Hungary; and the camel is found near the Black Sea. In the North of Europe, the rein-deer renders valuable service to man; many of its quadrupeds yield fur, and the elder duck furnishes the down so valuable in commerce. The forests abound with hares, foxes, deer, and wild boars; the wolf and the bear are common in Scandinavia. In the higher Alps and the Pyrenees are found the chamois, the wild goat, the bear, and the eagle. The birds of prey comprise the vulture, kite, eagle, and falcon. The north seas are yearly visited by immense shoals of herring, cod, salmon, and mackerel, and the Mediterranean has many species of fish.

The mineral riches of Europe are highly important, less on account of the precious metals, than the abundance of the commonest minerals. The most productive gold mines in Europe are those of the Carpathians in the N. of Hungary, Transylvania, and Russia. The richest silver mines are those of the Erzgebirge, the Carpathians, and the Harz in Germany, and the Alps in Scandinavia. Iron is widely distributed; it is most abundant in Britain, and general in the Cevennes, the Vosges, the Jura, the Eastern Alps, the Riesengebirge, and other mountains of Germany, and in the Scandinavian Alps. Lead is abundant in the E. part of the Sierra Nevada, in Cornwall, and in the Eastern Alps. Copper in Cornwall, the Eastern Alps, and the Alps of Scandinavia. Tin is nowhere plenty, except in Cornwall, and zinc is mostly found in the Riesengebirge. The principal mines of mercury are those of Almadén in the Sierra Morena, and of Idria in the Eastern Alps. Salt mines occur principally in the Carpathians and in the Eastern Alps; but sea salt is obtained abundantly on the greater part of the coasts—especially on those of the Black Sea. Coal is most abundant in Great Britain, but rich mines exist also in Belgium, in the Cevennes, and in the mountains between the Rhine and the Weser. The greatest amount of turf is obtained in the low plains of North Holland, and at the mouths of the Meuse and Rhine in South Holland. Europe was to a great extent plunged in barbarism, at a time when Asia and Africa had powerful nations, and rich and populous cities. The navigators of Phœnicia, Greece, and Tuscany diffused civilization and the arts through the countries of the S., while those of the middle and N. of Europe, separated by impenetrable forests and vast marshes, were inhabited by nomadic races, unacquainted with agriculture and commerce. Among these, however, the Celts, Germans, and Scandinavians formed powerful nations, who held disputed sway, till the Romans subdued all the countries of the S. and W., and during five centuries gave them their language, their arts, and their laws. In the fifth century, the Western Empire was dismembered by irruptions of barbarians, and Europe again partially reverted to a state of barbarism. Modern civilization dawned amidst the struggles consequent on the founding of the empire of Charlemagne, towards the close of the eighth century. It was facilitated by the crusades in the twelfth, and far more by the invention of printing and maritime discovery in the fifteenth century, which distributed over the globe the commerce and the colonies of Europeans, who now people the greater part of America, and have settled in Africa and the islands of the Eastern Ocean.

The population belongs to the Indo-European family of the Caucasian race, except a few Mongolian tribes in the N. and E. of the continent. The varieties of this family consist of the Teutonic or German, distributed over the N. and W. of Europe; the Slavonian in the centre and E.; the Hellenic and Pelsagian in the S., and the Celtic in the W. Christianity in its different forms is professed by a great majority of the inhabitants.

E. the Strait of Magellan, Patagonia. Estimated area 13,000 sq. m. The East Falkland island is nearly 100 m. in length N.E. to S.W. by 60 m. in greatest breadth, and the West Falkland about 90 by 50 m.; they are separated by Falkland Sound, from 9 to 12 m. in breadth. Others of the group are named the Great Swan, Saunders, Keppel, Pebble, Eagle, and Jacoa islands. Shores greatly indented, and mostly low, afford many good harbours. Surface more lofty in the W. than in the E. portion of the group, but in the latter are some hills 1,700 feet above the sea. Clay strata of the Miocene system constitute the greater part of the level country, and quartz rock the mountain summits. Climate temperate and healthy, but moist westerly winds, often very violent, prevail. Mean temperature of year 47° F., summer 66° F., winter 39° F., Fahr. Grass lands are extremely luxuriant, and these islands are well adapted for rearing live stock, already numerous in a wild state. The tussock grass grows to the height of 6 feet. Shrub trees are the only timber. Peat is abundant to the depth of 10 feet. Some vegetables are raised in the settled parts, but little or no corn. The only indigenous quadruped is a large fox; sea-fowl are in considerable numbers; snipe, quails, hawks, etc., and a species of vulture are found in the islands. Copper and iron ores have been discovered; seals and whales are plentiful around the coasts, and fish, especially cod, are abundant in the bays. These islands form a convenient station for ships to procure provisions and fresh water. Stanley Harbour was founded in 1833, and had a pop. of 450. The inhabitants are mostly Buenos-Ayres colonists, with some Indians, Europeans, and occasionally the crews of whaling vessels. The Falkland Islands were discovered by Davis in 1592, colonized by the French in 1763, taken by the Spaniards in 1767, and ceded in 1771 to the British, who have held uninterrupted possession of them only since 1833.

Lat. of lighthouse 38° 15' 50" N., lon. 15° 40' 40" E. On the hill above are two sea batteries and martello towers, the whole covered by a fort. The Faro-channel is a name given to the Strait of Messina, and the two great divisions of the Neapolitan dominions are accordingly called the Dominio al-di-la (on this side), and al-di-quà (beyond) di Faro.

FÄRÖR or the FAROE ISLES, a group of islands in the North Sea belonging to Denmark, 180 m. N.W. of the Shetlands, between lat. 61° 20' and 62° 25' N., lon. 6° 30' and 7° 40' W. They consist of 22 islands, of which 17 are inhabited, and extend 70 m. in length N. to S., and 46 m. in breadth E. to W. Pop. (1856) 8,651. Coasts steep and rugged, interior mountainous, highest peaks, in Osteroe, 2,864, and in Strömoe, 2,430 feet. The channels which separate the isls. afford several good bays. The islands enjoy all the advantages of an insular climate, and derive great benefit from the N. branch of the gulf stream, which, besides raising the temperature, carries to their shores considerable quantities of drift wood. The winters are extremely mild, so much so, that sheep and cattle require no housing. Summer moist and foggy. The longest day in summer is 20, and the shortest in winter 4 hours; but the length of the day is greatly extended by the morning and evening twilight, and by the aurora borealis. There is no timber on the islands, but turf is abundant. Barley is cultivated, but does not always ripen. Turnips and potatoes yield good crops. Most of the inhabitants are employed in the fisheries, of which that of a species of small whale is the most important; and in the preparation of wool. Sheep, of which there are about 80,000, form the chief riches of the islanders. The horses are small but powerful; waggoners are not employed. Sea-fowl are numerous; and feathers form a considerable article of commerce. Among minerals, the chief are fine opals and coal, the last especially in Sideroe. The people, of Norwegian descent, are robust and healthy; their spoken language is a dialect of the N. German, but their written language is Danish. The islands are governed by an amtmann, who is also military commandant, a judge, and a provost. The trade is a royal monopoly; and half of the soil belongs to the king. The islands are divided into 7 parishes under a bishop. Thorshavn, on the S. coast of Strömoe (pop. 720), is the cap. and the only town. The chief islands are Strömoe, the central and largest of the group. Area 146 sq. m. Pop. 2,600; Boedöe, pop. 850; Wideröe, pop. 156; Osteroe, pop. 1,780; Wangoe, pop. 600; Sandöe, 600; Skidöe, 60; Sideroe, pop. 1,100.

Formosa (Chinese Tai-wan), an island off the S. E. coast of China, partly independent, and partly comprised in the prov. Fo-kien, between 22° 30' and 25° 30' N., lon. 121° E., about 90 m. from the Chinese coast, from which it is separated by the channel of Fo-kien or Formosa. Estimated area 15,000 sq. m. The pop., which is estimated at 2,000,000 Chinese, but in the interior of the island, and on the eastern shores, a wild race exists who do not acknowledge the authority of China, and of whom little is known. A volcanic mountain chain, with summits said to be upwards of 10,000 feet in height, traverses the centre of the island from N. to S., separating the Chinese colonists of the N. and W. from the wild Formosans on the E. side. On some parts of the coast are bold headlands, but all the W. side is flat, and surrounded with quagmires and rocks. Surface of the Chinese portion well watered and generally fertile, producing rice, sugar, camphor, tobacco, wheat, maize, millet, various fruits and spices, coffee, cotton, hemp, silk, timber, and bamboo. The Chinese colonists are of a very mixed description, Formosa having been a kind of "Botany Bay" to China; but among them there are many wealthy and active traders; and an extensive commerce is carried on with Amoy and other ports of the opposite coast, to which all the shipping employed in the trade belongs. Principal exports, rice and camphor. Imports comprise tea, silk, woollens, and other manufactured goods. The native Formosans are a Malay race, little civilized, and living under petty chiefs. Formosa, with the Pangloss islands, forms a foo or dep., under the prov. Fo-kien, subdivided into 5 keens or dists. Its cap., Tachwan, is a Chinese city of the first class; and its schools are in much high repute in China, that the inhabitants often send their sons there to obtain literary degrees. It was the last conquest of the present Tartar dynasty, and has been always insecurely held by the Chinese. In 1623 the Dutch became masters of the island, but they were expelled by the pirate Coxinga, whose successors ruled here till 1663. The Nerbudda transport and the brig Ann, were wrecked on the island in 1841. The mountains yield gold, silver, cinnabar, and copper, and coal fields, several miles in extent, have recently been discovered, but the authorities prohibit their being worked.

Formosa, the most N. of the Bismarck islands, off the W. coast of Africa. It is fertile and well wooded, but has no good water. This is the name also of the river of Benue, of bays on the Brazil and Zanguebar coasts, and of a mountain of Johore, and another in Malacca.

FRANCO, a country of Western Europe, situated between lat. 42° 30' and 51° 6' N., lon. 6° 40' W., and 8° 15' E., bounded N.E. by Belgium, the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, Rhinish Prussia, and Rhinish Bavaria. On the E. it is separated by the Rhine from Baden, the Jews from Switzerland, the Rhone from Savoy, the Alps from Italy; bounded S. by the Mediterra-

Its principal islands are, Corsica, Hyères, and Lérins, in the Mediterranean; Nîmes, and Oléron, Ré, Belle-Ile, Diez, Groix, Sein, and Ouessant, in the Atlantic. Chief peninsulas, Bretagne (Brittany) and Cotenin in the English Channel. The coasts of Brittany are indented by numerous arms of the sea, which form excellent harbours. The two great gulfs are the Golfe de Gascogne (Bay of Biscay) on the W., and Golfe du Lion (Gulf of Lions) on the S. The principal bays are Canele and St Brieon on the N.; Breot road and the bays of Douarnenez and Audenne on the W. of Brittany; the bays of La Forest, and Quiberon, and Penet road on the S. of Brittany; the bay of Bourgneuf S. of the mouth of the Loire; Basque roads or the bay of La Rochelle, and the basin of Arcachon, W. of the dep. Gironde; the roads of Toulon, Cavalaire, Grimaud, Napoule, and Jouan, on the Mediterranean. The most remarkable capes are Gris-Nez in the English Channel, Cape Barfleur and Cape de la Hague in N. of dep. Manche; the Bec du Raz and the Pointe de Penmarch in Finistère, the N. dep. present vast plains, agreeably interspersed with hills; those on the S. and E. are mostly covered with mountains.—Among these are—I. the Alps between France and Italy; the principal summits of which, in France, are Monte Pelvoux 14,168 feet, Vise 12,682 feet, Genèvre 11,785 feet, and Ventoux 6,263 feet.—II. the Pyrenées between France and Spain; the chief summits in France are Monte Perdu 10,994 feet, Midi 9,438 feet, and Canigou 9,137 feet.—III. the Cevennes mountains in Languedoc; the highest points of which are Mezin 5,794 feet, and Lozère 4,884 feet.—IV. the mountains of Auvergne, a branch of the Cevennes; the highest points of which are Mont Dor 6,188 feet; Cantal 6,083 feet; and the Puy-de-Dôme 4,906 feet.—V. the Jura between Franche-Comté and Switzerland, in which the Reculet is 5,648 feet. The centre of France, comprising an 8th or 10th of its superficies, consists of plateaux from 1,900 to 1,900 feet in elevation, which are separated by narrow valleys.—VI. the Vosges mountains between Lorraine and Alsace; the summit of which is the Ballon d'Alsace 4,686 feet. The Vosges send contreforts into Franche-Comté and Champagne, and are connected with the Cevennes by a chain of heights which separate the basin of the Rhéne from those of the Seine and Loire, and in Burgundy are called the Côte d'Or.

The coast of the English Channel are generally bordered by sandy dunes; those of Brittany are covered with rocks. S. of the mouth of the Gironde, is a vast extent of country covered with marshy lakes (étangs) and shifting sands. France is watered by a great number of important rivers, the four principal of which are the Seine, which flows N. W. to the English Channel, the Loire and the Garonne, which flow generally W. to the Atlantic Ocean, and the Rhône, which flows S. into the Mediterranean. The other principal rivers are the Rhine, Meuse, Meun, Saône, Scheldt, and Lys, which contribute their waters to the basin of the North Sea, but have only a part of their course in France. The Somme, Oise, Yonne, Marne, Oise, Aisne, and Eure form the basin of the English Channel; the Silvise, Vidne, Saône-Niortaise, Charente, Adour, Ailier, Cher, Indre, Vienna, Creuse, Mayenne, Sarthe, Loire, Arlonne, Tarn, Gers, Lot, Dordogne, and Tide in the basin of the Atlantic; the Aude, Herault, Ain, Isère, Drôme, Rhône, and Durance in the basin of the Mediterranean. The different basins, and most of the principal rivers are connected by canals. It is calculated that there are 469 navigable rivers and 8,000 small streams, extending to 2,000 m. France has few lakes, but on the E. and S.W. coasts, numerous marshes and lagoons, many of which communicate with the sea by narrow channels. The roads are divided into national, departmental, and communal; the first are paved and kept in excellent order, and the whole have been much improved within the last twenty years. A system of railways has been projected to extend from Paris as a centre, to the extremities of the country in all directions, of which 4,500 miles were open in 1868, mostly accompanied by telegraphic wires.

France is comprised between the isotherm lines of 50° and 60° Fahr.; its surface is little elevated, the mean height being about 816 feet above the sea, and its climate is in general temperate, mild, and healthy. In the N., the winters are sometimes rigorous, and last more than half the year (mean temp. 50° Fahr.); in the S., the summers are long and warm, the sky almost always serene, and the winters of short duration (mean temp. 60° Fahr.); in the centre, the temperature is mild and more steady than in the N. and S. (mean temp. 58° Fahr.); mean annual quantity of rain in E. 23, W. 24, N. 22, and in the valley of the Rhone 35 inches. Number of rainy days between lat. 43° and 46°, 134; in the lat. of Paris 105, on the coasts of the Mediterranean 66, on the Atlantic 152, and in the interior 147. Along the coasts of the Mediterranean the S. winds, heated by the desert of Africa, often spread desolation. The mistral, a glacial wind from the N.N.W., occasionally arrests vegetation by its furious blasts in the basin of the Rhone, while the E. wind from the snowy Alps is equally dreaded in the E. depe. The basin of the Garonne is visited by cold S. winds from the Pyrenees, and by storms from the Bay of Biscay. The air is most moist, and rain most frequent, on the western coasts. Vegetable products are abundant and most varied; they comprise wheat and other cereals, potatoes, truffles, beet-root, from which sugar is manufactured; vines, which cover more than a 27th part of the superficies of the country, and furnish excellent wine, the most celebrated of which is that of Burgundy, Champagne, and Bordeaux; olive oil, the mulberry, hnt, hemp, tobacco, hops, medicinal plants, and dye woods. Among fruit trees, the apple, pear, cherry, walnut, chestnut, and almond abound. The orange, citron, olive, fig, pomegranate, and the pistachio, are confined to the regions of the S., along the shores of the Mediterranean. France produces excellent timber for ship-building and carpentry, and the cork-tree abounds in the S. The principal forests are those of Ardennes, Orleans, Fontainebleau, and Compeigne; it is calculated that 1-8th of the superficies is covered with wood. Among wild animals are the bear, wolf, fox, wild cat, wild boar, stag, roe-buck, fallow deer, the chamois, hare, rabbit, and beaver. The most common domestic animals are the horse, mule, ass, oxen, sheep, goats, pigs, and fowls. Among birds, are the eagle, falcon, buzzard, partridge, quail, and lark. Fish abound on the coasts, the most common in the Atlantic and English Channel are, the herring, turbot, sole, whiting, pilchard; and salmon in the estuaries; lobsters, mussels, and oysters are plenty on these shores. The Mediterranean contains peculiar species of fish, as the tunny and anchovy. The honey bee is extensively reared; and silkworms from one of the principal sources of wealth; the lucerne (Cleome Ifole), which is found near the shores of the Mediterranean, furnishes a crimson dye. The most important minerals are iron, which is found nearly over the whole country, and in 1845 yielded 448,000 tons; copper, lead, silver, antimony, sulphur, sulphate of iron, and mineral waters; gold mines are insignificant. The coal and salt mines are of great value. There are 88 coal, anthracite, and lignite basins, the richest of which are those of the Loire and that of Valenciennes in the dep. Nord. In 1845 there were 449 coal mines worked and unworked, employing 80,778 miners, and producing 4,141,617 tons of mineral fuel. The salt-marshes are a considerable source of wealth. Has building stones, and quarries of marble, alabaster slate, and a few precious stones.

The country is essentially agricultural. Since the commencement of the present century the cultivation of the soil has made remarkable progress, and in several deps. has been brought to great perfection. The progress of the industrial arts has been no less rapid during the same period; iron and coal mining has been annually on the increase; nearly 1,000 separate factories have been engaged in the fusion of metals, and the forging and manufacturing of iron and steel. The most important manufs. are those of arms, jewellery, watches, coach building, cabinet making, musical instruments, glass, crystal, pottery, chemical products, beet-root sugar, oil, soap, sugar, and salt refineries; dye-works, tanneries, paper making, and printing; silks, cottons, woolen cloths, carpets, shawls, and lace. The products of manuf. industry, with those of the soil, form the objects of an immense internal commerce. External commerce is much less important. Total amount of imports in 1850, real value, 31,628,665*l*.; official value of ditto 46,960,000*l*. Real value of exports, 42,724,887*l*.; official value, 61,240,000*l*. The principal ports are Marseille, Havre, Bordeaux, Nantes, La Rochelle, Dunkerque, Boulogne, Dieppe, St. Malo, L'Orient, Bayonne, and Cette. The chief commercial relations are carried on with the following countries:—the French colonies, Belgium, Switzerland, Sardinia, England, Germany, Spain, and the United States of North America, the imports from, and exports to which, in 1847, amounted to 1-6th of the whole external commerce of the country.

In ancient times France formed the greater part of Transalpine Gaul. It was subjugated by Cæsar in the year 50 B. C., and formed 17 Roman provs. In the 6th century, the Franks established themselves in the N., the Burgundians in the E., and the Visigoths in the S. In the 6th century, the Franks extended their dominions nearly over the whole of Gaul, but Brittany, Gascony, and Languedoc preserved their independence. The power of the Franks continued to increase, and under Charlemagne, at the end of the 8th century, their empire extended in Germany N. to the Elbe, and S.E. to the Thems, in Italy to Volturno, and in Spain to the Ebro. This empire was partitioned in the middle of the 9th century, when Germany detached itself from Gaul, which last was divided into two parts.—I. The kingdom of France, comprised between the Atlantic, the Pyrenees, the Mediterranean Sea, the Rhone, Saône, Meuse, and Scheldt.—II. Lotharingia, a long strip of territory between the Rhine and the Alps on one side, and the Scheldt, Meuse, Saône, and Rhone on the other; to this Italy was added. This state was once again divided into the kingdoms of Italy, Lombardy, and the History of France.—The French, called also Gauls, of Asia. Three-thirds were succeeded by the Gauls, namely, to the Germanic Empire. The kingdom of France was also parcelled out into feudal fiefs, and numerous seigniorial, of which the king had only an empty title before the family of Capet, who ascended the throne in 987, succeeded in uniting round their monarchy the different states of France; this process of concentration progressed under succeeding reigns, and was completed at the revolution of 1793, which subjected to equal laws the 83 gouv. or provs. of which the monarchy was then composed, and divided them into 83 departments. Artois and Flanders, which had been in the possession of the Popes for five centuries, were soon after united to France. The wars of the revolution rapidly increased the territory of the French republic. Belgium, all the countries of Germany situated to the left of the Rhine, Savoy, and Nice, were conquered, and formed into 16 new departments. This state of matters, confirmed by the treaty of Lunéville in 1801, and by that of Amiens in 1802, gave to France its natural limits, those of ancient Transalpine Gaul; but the conquests of Napoleon I. overstepped these bounds—his empire extended in Italy to Garigliano; in Germany to the mouths of the Elbe; in Ruritza to the Save and Cattaro, and included the Netherlands. The secondary states of Germany, Switzerland, the kingdoms of Naples and Spain became his vassals rather than his allies. The gigantic extension raised the whole of Europe against France, which, by the treaties of 1814-15, was again confined to its former limits. The most remarkable events in the history of France since the abdication of Napoleon I., are, the restoration of the Bourbons in 1815, the abdication of Charles X. in 1830, the election of Louis Philippe, Duke of Orleans, as king of the French in 1830, the revolution and his abdication in February 1848, the proclamation of a republic, and the election of Louis Napoleon as president in 1848, and his election as emperor in 1851. In 1854, his alliance with Great Britain, war was proclaimed against Russia, in consequence of its encroachments on Turkey. The language employed in the acts of administration is the French, which is spoken by the educated classes, and understood by nearly all the pop. The patois of many of the depts. are only corrupt dialects of the French; but German is spoken in Alsace and part of Lorraine, Flemish in part of the dep. Nord, Bas-breton in Brittany, Basque in Lower Pyrenees, and Italian in Corsica. The population are divided into the following religious denominations:—Roman Catholics, 32,370,000; Protestants, 1,800,000; Jews, 80,000. France is now divided into 86 depts., 68 of which are on the continent, and the island of Corsica forms the 86th. These were formed from the 83 provs. which existed previous to 1793, and named from the rivers, mountains, and other peculiar features which occur in them. The depts. are subdivided into arrondissements, cantons, and communes; each dep. is governed by a prefet, each arrond. by a sub-prefet, and each comm. by a mayer. There are 50 Roman Catholic dioceses, each administered by an archbishop or a bishop, and each ep. of a canton has a curate, and each diocese has a seminary under the direction of the bishop. The Lutherans have a general consistory established at Strasbourg, where they have also a seminary and a faculty of theology. The Catholics have cathedral churches in 86 depts., the most commonly in synods, and have a faculty of theology at Montpellier. The Jews have a central consistory at Paris, and 80 synagogues distributed over the country. For the administration of justice, France is divided into 27 ressorts de cours nationales; there is in each canton a justice de paix, and in each arrond. a tribunal of première instance. In the commercial towns there is a tribunal de commerce. The faculty of theology has six schools, and the faculty of law nine. The faculty of medicine has three schools of medicine, and three of pharmacy. Secondary instruction is given in national and communal colleges. There is a national college in most of the cities, and communal colleges in other towns. A normal school is established in Paris for training teachers. Primary instruction is imparted gratuitously in schools supported by the communes, and the teachers for these are trained in the normal school. In 1853 there were 338 public libraries (exclusive of Paris), containing 46,070 MSS., and 8,785,439 printed vols. For military purposes, the country is partitioned into 31 divisions, of which each department forms a subdivision, except Corsica, which forms two subdivisions. For the marine it is divided into five maritime prefectures, which are subdivided into arrond. and inscriptions. The administration of forests is divided into 32 arrond., embracing the principal towns in the different departments. In the year 1850 the army consisted of 408,062 men of all arms. The imperial navy comprised 352 sailing vessels, averaging from 10 to 120 guns each, and 209 steamships, of an aggregate power of 60,000 horses. Total vessels, 441, carrying in all 12,500 guns. In 1848 the estimated public revenue was 1,200,000,072 francs, and the expenditure 1,510,250,943 francs, leaving an excess of 1,398,680 francs. Public debt in 1848, 413,002,844 francs.

The colonies and foreign dependencies of France are, in America, the islands Martinique, Guadeloupe, Marie-Galante, Desirade, Salines, a part of St. Martin in the Antilles, French Guiana and Cayenne, St. Pierre and Miquelon, near Newfoundland, at the mouth of the St. Lawrence; Africa, Algeria, Senegal, and Gambia on the W. coast, and the islands Bourbon and St. Marie in the Indian Ocean, certain portions of Madagascar, and (since 1843) the islands Mayotta and Nossi-Bé. In 1843, France also took possession of Assinie at the W. of the gold coast of Guinea; Asia, Pondicherry and Karikal on the Coromandel coast, Mada on the coast of Malabar, Yancoo in Orissa, and Chandernagore in Bengal; Pacific Ocean, the two groups of the Marquesas and Tahiti, taken possession of in 1841, and the island of New Caledonia in 1854. The colonies are subjected to special laws. In 1845, an ordinance was passed, having for its object the amelioration of slavery in the French colonies, and in 1848 the provisional government decreed its total abolition.

It communicates by railways with Carlsruhe, Mainz, and Wiesbaden, and has a regular traffic with steam-packets on the Main. Two large fairs are held here annually. Charles-magne held a council in Frankfort in 793; it was fortified in 838 and 843, and erected into a free city in 1164. Napoleon I. made it cap. of a grand duchy. Goethe the poet was born here in 1749. The territory belonging to Frankfort, enclosed by Hessen and Nassau, has an area of about 35 sq. m., including 9 villages. Pop. (1849) 62,354, mostly Lutherans.

FRANKFORT (Germ. Frankfurt-am-der-Oder), a city of Prussia, prov. Brandenburg, cap. reg., on l. b. of the Oder, 50 m. E.S.E. Berlin, with which city it communicates by railway. Lat. 52° 29' 8" N., lon. 14° 33' 24" E. Pop. (1855) 90,998. It is enclosed by walls, and has three suburbs. Principal edifices, 3 protestant churches, Roman Catholic church, a Jews' synagogue, government and council-houses, post-house, gymnasium, high school, hospitals, and theatre. Its university, founded in 1506, was transferred to Breslau in 1811. It is the seat of the high court for its reg. and circle, a council of nobles, and boards of taxation, agriculture, and canals. It has manufs. of woollen and silk fabrics, stockings, earthenware, sugar, tobacco, and mustard, and brandy distilleries. Commerce extensive in German and foreign produce of all kinds, exported into Poland, Galicia, Russia, Bohemia, etc., by the canals and rivers, on which its inhabitants also carry on a flourishing transit trade. Near Frankfort is Kunnersdorf, scene of the defeat of the Prussians under Frederick the Great by the Austrians and Russians in 1759. The regency of Frankfort has an area of 8,000 sq. m. Pop. (1849) 860,067.

The chief rivers are the Vistula with its affluents, the Biala, Wloclawka, and San; the Bug, Dniester, and Pruth; there are numerous small lakes in the Carpathians. The surface in the N. comprises wide and fertile plains, while in the S. it is covered with sandstone hills, which spread out from the Carpathians far into the interior. Climate the most rigorous in the empire, on account of the continuous chain of mountains which interrupt the mild southerly breezes. Summer is of short duration, and winter, which is very cold, lasts six months. Mean annual temp. in the plain 46° Fahr. The principal crops are oats, wheat, barley, and maize. Flax, hemp, and tobacco are also cultivated. Cattle are extensively reared, and horses are numerous, and of a hardy breed. Sheep and horses are the chief stock in the Bukovina (the S.E. part of the kingdom). Bees are extensively kept, and honey and wax are exported. Minerals comprise marble, alabaster, sulphur, iron, coal, copper, zinc, but the most remarkable mineral production is fossil salt, the bed of which extends for 285 m. along the Carpathians from E. to W., and which, in the salt works of Wlodziwka and Bochnia, has been worked since the year 1200; and there are numerous mineral springs. The only manufactures of importance are spinning and weaving flaxen and hempen fabrics. Brandy distilleries are numerous. The inhabitants are of Slavonic origin, and speak the Polish language; there are 200,000 Jews, mostly merchants and distillers, the others are divided among the Roman Catholics and Greek churches, and a few Protestants. Galicia is in a backward state, but there is a university at Lemberg; there are numerous hospitals and charitable institutions; the chief criminal court is at Lemberg. The kingdom is divided into 19 circles, comprising 96 towns, 193 market towns, and 8,080 villages. Galicia, formerly comprised in Red Russia, derives its name from Galitz or Hales, a town on the Dniester which was cap. of an indep. principality in the middle ages, and Lodomeria takes its name from Vladimir in Volhynia, which was also cap. of a duchy. This country, which was long possessed by the Poles, was made over to Austria at the partition of the country in 1772 and 1795.

GANGES, a celebrated river of Hindoestan, through the N. part of which it flows from W. to E., traversing the centre of the presid. Bengal and Agra. It rises by two principal heads, the Bhageerettee and Aluknunda, in lat. 30° 54' N., lon. 79° 7' E. In the territory of Gurhwal, the Bhageerettee issues from under a low arch at the base of a snow bed 300 feet thick, which lies between St Patrick, St George, and the Pyramid mountains, respectively, 22,796, 22,654, and 21,379 feet in elevation above the sea. Above the outlet of the river, large icebergs are formed by the freezing of the melted snow water. From this place, 13,800 feet in elevation, the river flows N.W. to Bhaironag, in lat. 31° 2' N., lon. 78° 54' E., where it receives the Jahnui. The united river then flows W., and S.W. to Sookhee, where it breaks through the Himalaya Proper, and flowing S. it receives the Julkar and the Bhilling, and is joined by the Aluknunda at Deopras, lat. 30° 8' N., lon. 75° 39' E., when the united rivers take the name of the Ganges. From this it flows sinuously W., 39 m. to Hardwar, receiving in its course the Sooswa river. From Hardwar to Allahabad 438 m., it flows S.E. over shoals and rapids, fordable at several places, receiving the Ramgunga, Kallee-Nuddee, Eesun-Nuddee, and the Jumna. The river is navigable to small steamers for 393 miles above Allahabad. From Allahabad to Manjhee, it flows easterly for 270 m., and receives the Gogra, Goomtee, Tons, and Kurumnassa. In the dry season the average breadth in this part is from 1,200 to 1,500 feet, and at Benares 1,400 feet, depth 35 feet, discharge 19,000 cubic feet per second. At the same place during the rains, it is 3,000 feet broad, and 28 feet deep. The mean discharge of water throughout the year is 250,000 cubic feet per second. The depth of the channel is subject to great inequality, some parts exceeding 50 feet during the rains. Near Kutchwa, 35 m. above Benares, a shoal extends across the river, having only 30 inches water in the dry season. In lat. 26° 39' N., lon. 84° 53' E., it receives the Sone, a large river flowing from the S.W., which addition makes its channel a mile wide when clear of islands, but in the dry season the greater part is dry sand. Between Hajepoor and Kutrree, 180 m., it receives the Gunduck and Cootey. For 85 m. to Sikreegall, several tributaries from the north flow into the Ganges, but the evaporation is so great, that two miles below Sikreegall, where the river is about one mile in breadth, there is scarcely five feet water where deepest, with a current of 1½ m. per hour, and the river between Calcutta and Allahabad is so shallow in many places, that it cannot be safely navigated by vessels of more than 18 inches draught. At Sikreegall the river takes a S.E. course, which it holds till it enters the sea. In lat. 24° 44' N., lon. 87°

59° E., the Bhagirathi, a large stream leaves the main river on the right, and 70 m. lower down, another large river, the Jellinghee, branches off on the same side, these two branches then flow S. for 120 m., are reunited, and take the name of the Hoogly, becoming navigable for vessels of large burden at Chanderzagar, 150 m. from the sea, into which it falls in lat. 21° 40' N., lon. 88° E., its estuary being considered by the Brahminists the termination of the "Sacred Stream." Total course, from the source of the Jahnui till it enters the Bay of Bengal at Bangor, 1,514 miles. Below the divergence of the Bhagirathi and the Jellinghee, the main river is called the "Ganges," and from this place the delta of the Ganges and Brahmapoota commences. The Ganges, flowing S., receives several streams on the left, and on the right it throws off the Martabhangra Gorra and the Chundna. In lat. 28° 52' N., lon. 88° 45' E., it is joined by the Konale or Jabuna, the principal channel of the Brahmapoota, and here much larger than the Ganges. For the next 60 m. the united stream has a S.E. course, when the Kirtynassa is thrown off, and 65 m. below that divergence, it joins the Meghna, and then flowing S., it enters the Bay of Bengal in lat. 22° 16' N., lon. 90° 43' E., its total length from its issue beneath the snow, being 1,557 miles. The fall of the river is as follows: from Allahabad to Benares 6 inches per m., distance 139 m.; from Benares to Colgong 5 inches per m., distance 326 m.; from Colgong to Jellinghee 4 inches per m., distance 167 m.; from Jellinghee to Calcutta 4 inches per m., distance 170 m.; and from Calcutta to the sea 1 or 2 inches per m., according as the water may be at its highest or lowest state, distance 100 m. Access to that part of the Ganges above the delta from the sea, for ships of heavy burden, can only be attained through the channel of the Meghna, Poddá, or the Chundna. In the dry season, the communication by water between the Hoogly below Calcutta and the Ganges above the delta, is kept up by the circuitous course called the Soonderbund Passage, opening into the Chundna. Besides the principal rivers, numerous small streams enter the Bay of Bengal by the Soonderbund, a cluster of sea islands separated by many channels, flowing in all directions, but principally from N. to S. The tides are felt for 160 m. from the sea. The water of the Ganges begins to rise about the end of May, and is at its height in September. About the end of July all the low parts of Bengal, contiguous to the Ganges and Burhampooter, are overflowed for upwards of 100 m. in breadth, nothing appearing but villages and trees. Several tracts are guarded from inundation by means of dams, which have a collective length of upwards of 1,000 m. The Ganges varies in width; in the dry season its whole course through the plains is 1 m., and 2 m. in the freshes. The annual discharge of earthy matter is estimated at 3,363,077,449 cubic feet. The inland navigation connected with the Ganges, is very considerable, and is expected to be much increased by means of the Ganges Canal, opened 8th April 1854, the total length of which, with its branches, is about 810 m.

Geneva (Fr. Geneva, Germ. Genf, Ital. Ginevra), a walled town of Switzerland, cap. cant. same name, 33 m. S.W. Bern, on the Rhone, at its outlet from the W. extremity of the Lake of Geneva. Lat. of old observatory 46° 12' N., lon. 6° 2' E. Elevation 1,280 feet. Mean temp. of year 53°.7, winter 34°, summer 66°.4, Fahr. Pop. (1850) 30,984. Geneva, the most populous and industrious town in Switzerland, is the seat of the central administration of the canton, and has a Gothic cathedral, a university academy, founded by Calvin in 1558, a college with 16 professors and teachers, school of arts and manufactures, public library, and a large collection of curious MSS., botanic garden, observatory, museum of natural history, Calvinist, Lutheran, and Roman Catholic churches, and a synagogue. The Rhone divides the town into 2 parts; the smaller portion on rt. b. is called the Quartier St Germain, the principal seat of trade; between them is "the island," a favorite promenade, connected with the town by several bridges. A hydraulic machine raises the water of the Rhone for the supply of the public fountains. The principal manufactures of Geneva are watches, musical boxes, chronometers, mathematical instruments, jewelry, cutlery, firearms, and musical instruments. The manuf. of watches employs 3,000 workmen, the annual produce being 100,000 watches, nearly all gold. Has a quay along the river, an active transit trade on the lake, and steam conveyances with Villeneuve, Coppet, Nyon, Rolle, Ouchy, and Vevey. Few towns of its extent have produced, or adopted, so many learned men as Geneva. Among these are Calvin, Beza, Cranmer, Lesage, Sarcey, de Luc, Lefort, Nicker, and Rousseau. John Knox, the Scottish Reformer, was long a resident here. It was one of the chief towns of the Allobroges in the time of Cæsar; was subject to the Romans till the beginning of the 5th century; cap. of the 2d kingdom of Burgundy till 1034; and was under the sovereignty of the Emperor of Germany till the beginning of the 16th century. Calvin introduced the reformation here in 1536, and from that time Geneva, a free city, was considered the chief seat of Calvinism. It was taken by the French in 1798, and formed, till 1813, cap. of the dep. Léman in the French Empire, under Napoleon I. In 1814, along with a small territory, it joined the Helvetic Confederation.

Geneva, a cant. of Switzerland, is composed of the former republic of Geneva, and part of the county of Gex in Savoy, bounded N. by the cant. Vaud, E. by Savoy, E. by the Lake of Geneva, and W. by France (dep. Ain). Area 91 sq. m. Pop. (1840) 63,922. Surface undulating, but not mountainous. Soil fertile and well cultivated. GENOA (Ital. Genova, Fr. Genève, anc. Genoa), a fortified seaport city of Northern Italy, Sardinian States, cap. div., at the head of the Gulf of Genoa, Mediterranean, 79 m. S.E. Turin. Lat. of lighthouse 44° 24' 18" N., lon. 8° 54' 24" E. Pop. 110,882. Mean temperature of year 75° 1, winter 47° 3, summer 75° 1, Fahr. Climate subject to great vicissitudes, the N.W. wind (tramontane) cold and biting, and the S.W. warm and humid. The port, protected seaward by moles, the old and new, on the latter of which is a lighthouse 300 feet high, is surrounded landward by the city, which rises like an amphitheatre out of the water, being situated on the ridges of hills, and enclosed by two series of walls; the whole embraced by a line of detached forts and outworks, crowning the hills for a circuit of about 7 m. In the older part of the city the streets are steep and very narrow. Among its principal edifices are the Doria-Pamfili, the Royal Ducal, Brignole, D'Arzo, Serra, Spinola, Balbi, Pallavicini, and numerous other palaces, all rich in choice works of art; the cathedral, a Saraceno-Gothic structure, numerous other handsome churches, the university, with a library and botanic garden, the Albergo de Poveri, an asylum for 1,600 poor persons, two other hospitals, 15 conservatorie or female asylums, numerous convents, the exchange, bank of St George, arsenal, quays, and a bridge over a part of the city. It is an archbishop's see, and the seat of an admiralty council, and a tribunal and chamber of commerce. Has a royal college, a naval school, and important manufs. of velvet, silks, damask thrown silk, paper, soap, etc., with marble, alabaster, and coral works. It is a free port, and the great entrepôt of a large extent of country, the produce of which, comprising olive oil, rice, fruits, cheese, rays, steel, etc., with manufactured goods, form the chief exports, valued at 3,000,000*l.* yearly. Principal imports, cotton and woollen stuffs, cotton wool from Egypt, corn, salt fish, hardwares and tin plates, wool, tobacco, lead, and wax, valued at 2,000,000*l.* yearly. From the 11th down to the 18th century, it was, with some interruptions, the cap. of a commercial republic, which planted numerous colonies in the Levant, and on the shores of the Black Sea. It was taken by the French in 1797, and ceded to the King of Sardinia in 1815. The railway from termination of the Turin line, through the city to the harbour, was opened in 1853.

GEORGIA or GEORGIA, anc Iberia, now included in the gov. Tiflis, Russia, in the Caucasus country, Western Asia, composing the central & W. portion of Transcaucasia, between lat 38° & 42° 30' N., lon. 43° & 47° E. Area 31,500 sq. m. P. statum at 673,000, mostly Christian Greeks. Surface mountainous: but its centre, traversed by the Kur and its affs, is an unulating & fertile plain. Corn of numerous kinds, pomegranates and other fruits, madder, flax, hemp, cotton, and wine, are among the principal products. Forests extensive, and consist of most of the trees common in Europe, but they are turned to little profit. Coal, iron, baphtha, and other minerals are supposed to be abundant, but few mines are wrought. The houses, vehicles, etc. are of the rudest kind, and education in every respect is very backward. Some wollen, cotton, and silk fabrics, leather, shagreen, etc., are made, and the arms produced at Teflis have some reputation, but, except these, the wares manufactured are very inferior. The Russians have established a printing office here. The Georgians are a peculiarly handsome race of people, and the females were formerly sold in large numbers to supply the harems of the Turks and Persians, but the events of 1864 have greatly suppressed this traffic. The Georgian language resembles that of Armenia, with the addition of many foreign words. Principal towns, Teflis the cap., Elisabethpol, Gori, & Telav. Georgia was annexed to Russia in 1802. Georgia, one of the original states of the U. S., North America, in S. part of the Union, between lat. 30° 30' and 35° N., lon. 80° 46' and 84° 41' W., having on the E. South Carolina, from which it is separated by the Savannah river, S. Florida, W. Alabama, and N. Tennessee and North Carolina. Length N. to S. 300 m., breadth E. to W. 256 m. Area 59,000 sq. m., or 57,120,000 ac., of which 5,375,479 are under cultivation, and the remainder uncultivated. Pop. (1800) 162,665; (1820) 340,067; (1850) 395,191, of whom 289,395 were $\frac{1}{2}$ varied. From the same for 100 m. inland, is a plain gradually rising to 500 feet in elevation, near the head of the navigation of the Savannah, Ogeechee, Oconee, and Camille rivers. Another plain succeeds, of 60 or 70 m. in breadth, on the N.W. of which are the Blue Ridge mountains, elevation 1,200 to 4,000 feet. In the S.E. are the Okefonokee Swamps, 122 m. in circuit, filled with pools, on the islands in which grow the vine, bay-tree, and underwood. The state has many navigable rivers, and good motive power, 34 cotton mills out of 36 being driven by water. Principal rivers, the Alabama, the Savannah, and the Chattahoochee. The sea-coast is bordered by a chain of small islands, on which the famous sea-island cotton is raised. Climate various, — in the S. hot, on the N. rather cold. Winter mild, snow seldom seen. Rain falls 55 days in the year. A large proportion of the soil is fertile, but in the low country are extensive swamps. Products, cotton, wool, flax, sugar, honey, wheat, corn, rice, tobacco, potatoes, and cattle. Minerals comprise gold, silver, copper, iron, coal, marble, lime-stone, and granite. The state has 18 banking establishments, with an aggregate capital of \$6,231,315 dollars. It has manufs. of cotton, iron-works, and tanneries. Value of exports in 1851, 4,359,400 dollars. It has 857 m. of railway completed, and 311 in course of construction. Length of canals, 50 m. Has a state lunatic asylum, deaf-mute asylum, and a state penitentiary. There are 1,723 churches of all denominations, with accommodation for 612,817 persons. In 1851, there were five colleges, having an attendance of 506 students, with libraries in which were 23,800 volumes; theological and medical schools; a female college, with an attendance of 140 pupils; 18,493 pupils attending private schools; and at public schools 29,675 pupils, and the school fund amounted to 267,310 dollars. The state is divided into 97 cos. Present constitution, formed in 1798 and amended in 1839, consists of a governor elected for two years, senate of 47 members, and house of representatives of 100 members. The state has 8 members in the national house of representatives, and 10 electoral votes for president of the United States. GERMANIC CONFEDERATION. [GERMANY.]

GERMANY (Germans Deutschland, French Allemagne, ancient Germania), a country of Central Europe, between lat. 44° 45' and 55° 55' N., lon. 6° and 30° E.; within these limits is comprised all the countries belonging to the Germanic Confederation, consisting of 35 sovereignities (including four free cities); bounded N. by the German Ocean, Denmark, and the Baltic; E. by Prussian Posen, Poland, Galicia, Hungary, and Croatia; S. by Istria, the Adriatic, Italy, and Switzerland; W. by France, Belgium, and the Netherlands. Area 244,634 sq. m., of which 600 m. is washed by the German Ocean and the Baltic, and 25 m. by the Adriatic. Germany is divided naturally into three regions—the upper or S. region, the middle or the region of plateaux, and the lower or N. region. The chain of the Alps, which covers the whole of the S. part, comprises five principal groups.—I. the Alpines Alps, the chief ramifications of which follow the course of the Inn on the N., and branch out to the Bavarian Alps and the mountains of Vorarlberg, and extend W. to the Lake of Constance and the Schwarzwald, near the source of the Danube. Culminating points, Ortler Spitz, and Doediberg.—II. the Noric Alps, over an extent of 130 m., the contriforts of which form the Styrian and Austrian Alps, extending to the Danube. Culminating point, Gross Glockner, 12,420 feet.—III. Carnic Alps, between the sources of the Drave and the Col de Saisnitz. Culminating point, Marmolata, 11,483 feet.—IV. Julian Alps, from the Col de Saisnitz to Mount Kleck in Carniola, 143 m. Culminating point, Terglou, 11,154 feet.—V. Dinaric Alps, which are prolonged to Dalmatia and Herzegovina. The chain of the Carpathians commences at the mouth of the March in the Danube, and extends to the source of the Vistula, forming the S.E. confines of Germany. Culminating point, Mount Butchjetz, 9,528 feet. On the W. of Germany, and at the extremity of the Alpine range, which passes between the Danube and the Lake of Constance, a chain of heights extends N. to the plain of Westphalia, separating the basin of the Rhine from that of the other affluents of the German Ocean. Its principal masses are the Schwarzwald (Black Forest) between the valleys of the Rhine and Neckar; the Odenwald, the Rhöngebirge and the Vogelsgebirge, the Taunus and Westerwald. Culminating point, the Feldberg. On the S. of the Rhine, the chief mountains are the Harz and Hohenwald. The Fichtelgebirge in the N. of Bavaria, separates the basins of the affluents of the German Ocean and the Black Sea, and forms the nucleus of the Erzgebirge, the Bohmerwald, the German Jura, and the Thuringenwald. The whole of the country comprised between the mountains on the S., and the German Ocean and Baltic on the N., forms part of the great plain of N. Europe, and is traversed by large rivers, which extend W. to the Netherlands, and E. to Poland and Russia. The N. coasts are low, and require the protection of dykes, where not defended by sandhills; the N.W. part, below the mouths of the Ems and Elber, is bathed by the German Ocean. The principal gulfs are the Dollart and the Jade. The N.E. part, between the Canal of the Elber and the outlet of Lake Tsarnowitz, is bathed by the Baltic. Its principal gulf is the Haff formed by the estuary of the Oder. On this coast, and separated from it by a narrow arm of the sea, are the 3 great islands of Germany, Rügen, Usedom, and Wollin. The S. coasts, bathed by the Adriatic, are flat in the W., high and rocky in the E.

The waters of Germany flow N. to the German Ocean and the Baltic, S. to the Adriatic, and E. to the Black Sea. Its principal rivers, in the basin of the German Ocean, are the Rhine, with its affluents the Neckar, Main, Moselle, Lahn, Slay,

The lakes of Germany belong to the Alpine regions, in the basins of the Rhine and Danube on the S., and to the plain of the Baltic on the N. There are few in the centre. The principal are in the Alps,—the Lake of Constance, the Chiem See, Wurm See, Ammer See, Lake of Gmunden, Aller See, Mond and Traun See, and the Werther and Zirknitz See. These are mostly deep basins, surrounded by mountains, as in Switzerland. The lakes of Northern Germany are of quite an opposite character, being mostly shallow marshes in the nearly level plains. The chief of these are the Eutiner and Plöner See, in Holstein; the Malchiner, Plauen, and Mauritz See, in Mecklenburg; the Ruppiner and Ucker See, in the Mark; and the Madue, Villn, and Strelitz See, in Pomerania. Germany is partitioned into numerous small states, which, according to the federal acts of 1815, form the Germanic Confederation.

The following table shows its population and contingent to the Confederated army in 1855:—

The climate of Germany is in general temperate and healthy; it varies greatly in different quarters. Southern Germany, notwithstanding the heat of its valleys is, on account of its elevation, proportionally colder than the more N. basins of the Rhine, Main, Neckar, Moselle, and Danube. Further N., the mountains of Central Germany separate the climates of the S. and N. In S. Germany the winters are short and so mild, that snow lies only a few days; summer sets in early, and the heat in the valleys is often excessive, and here maize, the chestnut, and the vine, flourish. In the N.W., the cold of the long winters is so severe, that the rivers and lakes are for months together covered with ice strong enough to bear loaded waggons, and the ground is for 3 or 4 months covered with deep snow.

The minerals of the country are extensive and varied. Gold and silver occur in Saxony, Bohemia, and in the Harz. Iron, copper, tin, lead, mercury, bismuth, zinc, arsenic, cobalt, antimony; all kinds of building marble, and many of the precious stones; porcelain clay, coal, turf, and salt in numerous springs and rich mines, besides mineral springs. The vegetable products comprise all kinds of cereals, the chief of which, in the N., are wheat, rye, barley, oats, and especially buckwheat; in the S., spelt and maize, garden produce of all kinds, and potatoes (which are best in the N.) The principal plants used in manufs. are—flax, in Silesia, Saxony, Thuringia, Hanover, Westphalia; hemp chiefly in S. Germany. Tobacco, hops, rape seed, poppy, madder, saffron, aniseed, coriander, liquorice; the cultivation of beet root for the manuf. of sugar, has been lately much extended. Fruit trees comprise the apple, pear, chestnut, almond, walnut, and apricot. The vine, first introduced by the Romans, is cultivated to lat. 51° N., but chiefly in the valley of the Middle Rhine and on the Danube, in Lower Austria, and in the valleys of the Mosel, Neckar, and Main. Timber is very extensively distributed, especially in the N.E., not only on the mountains (from the wooded character of which the word "Wald" (wood) is often used for mountain), but also in the plains. The pine prevails in the E., the oak and beech in the W.

Germany is abundantly provided with all the useful domestic animals; horned cattle are excellent in Friesland and Franconia; horses in Holstein, Mecklenburg, and Hanover; sheep in Saxony, Silesia, Bohemia, and Thuringia; pigs in Westphalia, Mecklenburg, and Salsburg; asses and mules are not numerous. Among wild animals are the bear, the chamois, and the marmot in the Alps; the wolf is most abundant in the valley of the Rhine; the hamster in the Harz; the lynx, fox, martin, and weasel generally. The eagle and vulture are chiefly found in the Alps; geese in Pomerania; pheasants in Bohemia. Fish are less abundant in the German rivers than formerly; the most common are carp, pike, perch, eel, and trout. Bees are very generally kept, especially in the northern meadows. The silk-worm is not extensively reared.

The inhabitants of Germany belong chiefly to the Teutonic race and a mixture of the Slavonian. To the first, belong the population of Thuringia, Hesse, Franconia, Swabia, Bavaria, and part of Carinthia. Upper Styria, Austria, Tyrol, Brandenburg, the countries of the Middle and Lower Rhine, extending to France and the Netherlands, besides the Saxons in Westphalia, Holstein, Lower Saxony, and Friesland on the German Ocean; and to the second, the inhabitants of Upper Saxony, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, Silesia, Moravia, Lausitz, part of Bohemia, Styria, and Carniola. The Magyars are a distinct race, probably of Finnish or Hunnish descent. Among these are mixed French, since the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and many Jews and Italians in the S. part of the Tyrol and Illyria. The rich and powerful German language is everywhere predominant; it is divided into high and low German, the first of which is the chief written language. The population comprises Roman Catholics, 37,758,397; Protestants, 24,547,430; Greek Church, 6,653,059; and Jews, 1,106,877. General education in Germany is of a higher order than in any other country of Europe; in many of the states the common schools are excellent, especially in Saxony and Thuringia. In 1846, the 19 universities of Germany (exclusive of Austria) had 11,389 pupils. There are numerous gymnasia, lycæums, academies, learned societies, and richly furnished public libraries in the different states. The advantages derived from these institutions are apparent in the great activity exhibited in every branch of literature and science, and in the importance of the German book trade. Architecture, printing, and the preparation of astronomical and optical instruments have attained great excellence. The chief branches of industry are agriculture, cattle rearing, and mining. Germany is not generally a manufacturing country, in so far as steam power is concerned, but many parts, especially Silesia, Bohemia, Lusatia, Hanover, Westphalia, and Hesse, are distinguished for the manuf. of linens. The other manufs. comprise woollens in Austria, Saxony, Rhenish Prussia; iron, steel, and other metals in Styria, Carinthia, Silesia, Saxony, Thuringia, the Harz, Rhenish Prussia, and Nassau; gold and silver work in Augsburg; wooden wares, clocks, and toys in the Schwarzwald; glass in Bohemia; porcelain in Saxony, Prussia, and Austria. Leather is an important manuf. all over Germany. Breweries and brandy distilleries are numerous, especially in the N. The manuf. of cotton is important in Rhenish Prussia, Saxony, and Lower Austria, and silk in Vienna, S. Tyrol, Berlin, and Cologne. Tobacco manufs. are numerous, and the manufs. of paper and straw goods are important. The trade of Germany, formerly greatly trammeled by the different rates of duties and customs levied by the separate states, has recently received a fresh impulse from the institution of the German commercial customs' union (Zollverein), by which the several states agree to a uniform rate of charges in transport duties and portages, and a fixed rate of exchange. This system was commenced by a few of the governments in 1825, since then it has been joined by all the states of the empire except Austria, Holstein, Hanover, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and the free cities of Bremen, Hamburg, and Lubeck. Commerce is greatly facilitated by the numerous navigable rivers, all of which are traversed by steam-packets, and by an excellent system of railways, of which, in 1854 (excl. of Austria) 2,930 m. were open.

For nine centuries previous to 1792, Germany formed an empire governed by a sovereign, elected by the different states. For the purposes of administration, the empire was divided into 10 circles, and comprised, besides the kingdom of Bohemia, the margravate of Moravia, and the duchy of Silesia: its cap. was Vienna. The diet or general assembly of the empire, which was composed of three colleges, was convoked by the Emperor; he was assisted in the administration of affairs by the Aulic council, which exercised the functions of the supreme court of the empire. The conquests of the French, and the annexation of Belgium and the other countries on the l. b. of the Rhine to France, led to the dissolution of the empire in 1806. This was replaced temporarily by the Confederation of the Rhine, which had for its object, mutual assistance and the maintenance of peace among the confederate parties, who consisted of the kings of Bavaria and Württemberg, and several petty sovereigns. The confederation was established at Paris, 12th July 1806, under the protection of Napoleon I. Its territory was from time to time considerably augmented, till its dissolution in 1813. In 1815, the congress of Vienna established the Germanic Confederation, composed of all the states of Germany, who formed an alliance to secure the integrity of their laws and their respective territories, and to maintain the peace and order of the whole. The different states contribute to the military force in proportion to their population. The Confederation is represented by an assembly, called the Diet, composed of deputies from the different states, the seat of which is at Frankfurt on the Main. This state of matters was interrupted in 1848, when, in consequence of revolutionary movements, the governments of many of the German states were changed. On 31st March, 360 deputies held a preliminary assembly at Frankfurt for the formation of a Germanic parliament, which held its first sitting on 18th May, and elected a president, and on the following day the Archduke John of Austria was elected regent or vicar of the empire: he was installed on the 12th July, on which day the diet held its seventy-first sitting.

GHAUTS (Western), a mountain range of Southern India, extending from the valley of the Taptee, lat. 21° 21' N., lon. 73° 45' E., for 800 miles along the western side of the peninsula, at a distance of 10 to 60 miles from the coast. The range increases in elevation as it extends southwards, and at Malabulshwar, lat. 18°, is 4,700 feet above the sea. South of this it decreases till in lat. 15° it is only 1,000 feet. Still farther S. it again rises and reaches its culminating point, estimated at 7,000 feet, in Benassan hill, near Coorg. In lat. 11° 15' S. the Ghauts merge into the Neilgherry hills and terminate abruptly in the precipices forming the N. side of the Palghat valley. The mountains extending 300 miles S. from this valley to Cape Comorin, and which may be considered an extension of the W. Ghauts, have a table-land 4,740 feet high, and several peaks from 8,000 to 7,000 feet above the sea. The geological structure of the W. Ghauts is generally of primary formation, with alternating strata of more recent origin, which has been broken up by outbursts of volcanic rocks. In the N. portion, from lat. 21° to lat. 18°, it is overlaid with trap. South of this it is succeeded by laterite, which forms the overlying rock nearly to Cape Comorin. The W. side of the range is abrupt and steep, while on the E. it is undulating, and slopes gradually to the plains. From the holdness and precipitous character of the trap rocks many parts of the range are nearly inaccessible, and their natural fastnesses having been improved by art, the hill forts of the Ghauts have always been regarded as the bulwarks of the Deccan. The amount of moisture condensed in these mountains is so great, that at Mahabuleswar the annual fall of rain is 230 inches, while at Bednore, on the W. border of the table-land of Mysore, lat. 13° 49' N., lon. 75° 6' E., there is 8 months of rain in the year. The numerous torrents which traverse the low lands between the Ghauts and the sea stagnate as they approach the coast, and form a series of shallow lakes called backwaters.

GHAUTS (EASTERN), a mountain chain of S. India, rising in about lat. 21° N., near Balasore, on the E. side of the peninsula opposite the W. Ghauts. The range has a N.W. direction W. of Ganjam to Naggeri Nore, 50 m. N.W. Madras, where, turning S.W. by Chittoor and Salem it joins the W. Ghauts N. of the Gap of Paulgautcherry. Average elevation 1,500 feet. The geological formation of the range is granite, overlaid with gneiss and mica-slate. The term Ghaut, which means a pass, and is now applied to the two mountain chains, originated in those chasms in the ridges which give access to the highlands.

GHASEEPUR, a dist. of British India, N.W. prov., enclosed by Azimgurh, Sarun, Shahabad, Benares, and Jaunpur, between lat. 25° 17' and 26° N., lon. 83° 8' and 84° 40' E. Area 2,197 sq. m. Pop. 1,069,287. Soil fertile, yielding two crops in the year. Towards the end of June, when the rainy season begins, the kurreef crop, consisting of maize, indigo, rice, pulse, and oil seed, is sown, and gathered in the beginning of winter. In the cold season the rabbee crop, which comprises barley, wheat, corn, grain, safflower, oil-seeds, sugar, opium, tobacco, and cotton, is sown, and gathered in summer. Value of exports in 1841, 4,354,486 rupees; imports 52,636 rupees. Principal river, the Ganges. Irrigation, which is universally adopted on account of the rubbee crop, is procured by means of wells, tanks, and rivers. Climate healthy. In the cold months the thermometer ranges from 58° to 71°; and in summer from 86° to 98° Fahr. The dist. was annexed to British India in 1775.

Lat. 33° 34' N., lon. 66° 18' E. Pop. (excluding garrison) estimated from 8,000 to 10,000. It stands on a scarp rock, 280 feet above the adjacent plain on its W. side; and its walls about 35 feet in height, and flanked with numerous towers, form an irregular square about 1½ m. in circumference; the whole being enclosed by a fauze-braye and a wet ditch. In the N.E. part of the town is the citadel, with a palace, magazine, and granary; the whole city is, however, commanded by adjacent heights. From its elevated position the winter cold is intense; from 16° to 20° below zero. It has several bazaars, and is an entrepôt for the trade between Afghanistan and the Punjab. Old Ghuznee, destroyed in the 12th century, is about 3 m. N.E.; its ruins cover an extensive space, and here are two fine minarets, and the tomb of Mahmood of Ghuznee, whence the famous "gates of Somnauth" were removed in 1842. Under the dynasty of Mahmood of Ghore, and his father Subuctaghai, about the beginning of the 11th century, Ghuznee was the cap. of an empire, reaching from the Ganges to the Tigris, and from the Jaxartes to the Indian Ocean. It was stormed and taken by the British under Lord Keane, July 23, 1839; in 1842 the garrison surrendered it to the Afghans, but it was retaken in the same year by the troops under General Nott.

GIBRALTAR, a strongly fortified seaport town and garrison belonging to Great Britain, near the S. extremity of Spain, where it occupies a mountainous promontory, E. of its bay, and on the N. side of the detroit of Gibraltar, at the entrance to the Mediterranean, 60 m. S.E. Cadix. Lat. of the Moles $36^{\circ} 7' 3''$ N., lon. $5^{\circ} 21' 2''$ W. Mean temperature of year 67° A., winter 57° 9., summer 77° 8. Fahr. East winds prevail for 184 days, and west winds for 177 days. Number of rainy days 68, quantity of rain 43 inches. Snow and ice are rare, but in winter the cold is extreme. The celebrated rock (ancient Mons Calpe, one of the "pillars of Hercules"), forms a promontory connected with the continent by an isthmus of sand, and consists of a mass of grey limestone or marble, containing numerous caves, and is 3 m. in length N. to S., by $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ m. in breadth. It rises abruptly to 1,600 feet above the sea, on all sides except the W., and is everywhere fortified by works of great strength and extent; and besides these there are two galleries excavated in the rock, 2 m. in length, and of sufficient width to admit carriages. At the S. extremity, Europa Point, are a signal-house and a lighthouse. Surface parched in dry weather, but after rain covered with vegetation. The zoology of the rock comprises monkeys without tails, and of a dark fawn colour, and the only species of that animal to be found native in any part of Europe, snakes, rabbits, and woodcocks. The town is built on its W. side, which shelves down to the bay; and here the fortifications have latterly been greatly improved and strengthened. Pop. (excluding garrison) about 15,000. The principal street is 1 m. in length; but the houses generally are consulted to the climate, not being furnished with open courts and galleries. Principal edifices, the governor's house, the admiralty, naval hospital, victualling office, barracks, cathedral, and exchange, with a library, club and newspapers. Here are a Roman Catholic church, Wesleyan chapel, synagogue, and subscription school. Outside of the "south port" are the esplanade, the English cemetery, and a suburban residence of the governor. The harbour is good, and protected by two moles, one 1,100 and the other 700 feet in length. Gibraltar was made a free port in 1704, and its trade is still considerable, though it has latterly suffered from the rivalry of Malta and Genoa. Imports from Great Britain in 1801 valued at 481,980*l*. Public revenue 29,770*l*. Annual expense of garrison to Great Britain 200,000*l*. The town derives its name (Gih el-Tarik, "mountain of Tarik") from its Moorish founder Tarik or Tarif, who lived early in the 8th century. It was ceded to Spain by the Moors in 1462, and taken by the English, under Sir G. Rooke, in 1704. Under Lord Heathfield it withstood successfully a memorable siege by the French and Spaniards in 1782.

GLAUGOW, a city and parliamentary borough of Scotland, lower ward of Lanarkshire, on the Clyde, 43 m. W. of Edinburgh, in lat. 56° 31' N., lon. 4° 17' W. Pop. in 1801, 83,769; in 1831, 125,087. The city is built on a gentle declivity, sloping towards the bank of the Clyde, where 3 stone bridges, and a suspension bridge, communicate with the suburb of the Gorbals, on the N. bank. The leading streets, Gallowgate, Trongate, and Argyle Street, run in a continuous line of 2 m. parallel with the river, while many other streets diverge on both sides. N.W. of Argyle Street are numerous squares and crescents, with many splendid streets and mansions, the residences of the more opulent citizens. Length of city 4½ m.; breadth 3 m. The most ancient part of the town is on elevated ground to the N.E., where stands the cathedral of St. Mungo, a fine old Gothic structure, supposed to have been founded in 1186, and bearing marks in its architecture of various dates of erection; length 310 feet, height of tower and spire 225 feet. The choir of the cathedral is still used as a place of worship, and a curiously arched crypt below, once used as a church, is now converted into a cemetery. S.W. of the cathedral, in the High Street, is the university, founded in 1450. It is well endowed, annual income about 30,000*l.*, and consists of a chancellor, rector, dean, principal, 16 college professors, 14 regius professors, an average number of 250 students; a library with 50,000 vols., and a museum founded by Dr W. Hunter. Connected with the university is an astronomical observatory, and there is also a botanic garden in N.W. suburbs. The Andersonian university, founded 1788, is for the popular diffusion of science and literature among all classes of the community. Besides these, there are a faculty of physicians and surgeons, a mechanics' institute, high school, 2 normal schools, an atheneum, and numerous private seminaries of education. Charitable institutions, a royal infirmary, lunatic asylum, blind asylum, deaf-mutes' institution, town's hospital for the poor, Hutcheson's hospital for education of boys, and house of refuge. Has a gaol, court-house, a bridewell, and a police office. There are 4 banks and several bank agencies in the city, a chamber of commerce and an elegant royal exchange, with an equestrian statue of Field-Marshal the late Duke of Wellington, 2 theatres, a city-hall, co. building, merchant house, trades' house, custom house, western and union club-houses, barracks, an equestrian statue of the Queen, and several other monuments and statues. The royalty, originally embracing one parish, is now divided into 10; and, with the barony and suburbs, other 18, including quoad sacra par. There are 80 Free Churches, 19 United Presbyterian, 4 Independent, 5 Baptist, and 7 other congregations, 4 Methodists, 1 Unitarian, 4 Episcopal, and 4 Roman Catholic. Glasgow is supplied with water obtained from the Clyde and from springs in the vicinity, by 2 water companies. There are 2 large gas works. The Green, with a monument to Admiral Lord Nelson, on the N. bank of the river, forms an extensive airing ground of 100 ac.; and E. of the cathedral is a picturesque necropolis, with 3 other cemeteries in the vicinity. Numerous railways communicate with the surrounding districts, and the Clyde affords great facilities for steam-boat conveyance. The Broomielaw harbour extends W. from Jamaica Street along the river, which has been deepened, so as to admit ships of 2,000 tons. The wharves and docks afford extensive accommodation for vessels of every description. Revenue of harbour (1771) 1,444*l.* (1820) 6,323*l.* (1850) 64,234*l.* Glasgow is celebrated as the Scottish emporium of trade and manufactures. It was here that Watt first began his improvements on the steam-engine, and in the "Clyde the "Comet," the first boat in Europe successfully propelled by steam, was launched in 1812. In 1828, the aggregate tonnage of sailing vessels amounted to 211,315, do. of steam-vessels 481,940 tons. In 1850, the aggregate tonnage of sailing vessels was 382,093, do. of steam-vessels 873,158. Customs revenue (1850) 640,608*l.*; and the aggregate tonnage of sailing and steam-vessels which entered and sailed from the port was 1,175,526 tons. The trade of Glasgow rose into importance about the middle of last century, and consisted chiefly of American and West Indian commerce, embracing nearly a half of the whole British tobacco trade. Since then the manuf. of cotton goods has risen to a great extent, as have also woollens and silks, glass and stone ware, chemical manufs.; iron foundries, and machinery of all kinds, especially steam-engines. Ship-building is extensively carried on, both in wood and iron. In 1846 there were 141 iron furnaces in the vicinity, and 600,000 tons of iron sold. The annual consumption of coal, chiefly from pits in the vicinity, is estimated at nearly 2,000,000 tons, and 250,000 tons are exported. Glasgow was early distinguished for its superior letter-press printing, its Foulis' edition of the classics and other books. It publishes at present a daily newspaper, and about 13 others, at various intervals. There are three large suburbs connected with the city—Gorbals, on the l. b. of the river, Calton, forming the E. suburb, and Anderson the W.; these three are boroughs of barony. Port Dundas, an extensive suburb, is immediately to the N., on elevated ground, where is the terminus of the Forth and Clyde Canal. Mean annual temperature 49° 8 Fahr. Mean annual fall of rain 32 inches. The Romans had a station on the river Clyde, in the locality of Glasgow, which they retained till the year 426. Antoninus' wall commenced a few miles W. of the city. In 560, the see of Glasgow is said to have been founded by Kentigern or St Mungo; about the year 1116 the see was re-founded by David, Prince of Cumberland. It was first erected into a burgh of regality by William the Lion in 1180. Towards the end of the 16th century it was converted into an archbishopric, and in 1611 into a royal burgh. Rev. of police and statute labour trust, about 60,000*l.* per annum. The city is divided into 16 dists., each sending 3 members to its council, governed by a Lord Provost, 8 bailies, 39 councillors, a dean of guild, deacon, convener, and treasurer. Annual income of burgh (1848) 10,267*l.* It is the seat of sheriff, burgh, and co. courts. Birthplace of General Sir John Moore, and Thomas Campbell the poet. It sends 2 members to H. of C. Reg. electors (1848) 12,154.

GLoucestershire, a co. in the W. of England, bounded N.W. to N.E. on Hereford, Worcester, and Warwick; S. Gloucestershire; S. Berks, Wilts, and Somerset; W. the estuary of the Severn and the Bristol Channel. Area 1,253 sq. m., or 805,120 ac., of which about 750,000 are grass and arable. Pop. 444,462. It has 3 natural divisions; the E. being the Cotswold Hills, varying in height from 200 to upwards of 1,000 feet, and now mostly enclosed and arable; the middle forming the fertile valley of the Severn and its affls.; and the division W. of the Severn, consisting mostly of the Forest of Dean. Chief rivers, the Severn, Upper and Lower Avon, Wye, and Isis. In the hills, sheep farming is the chief branch of industry; the number of sheep is estimated at 600,000, and the annual produce of wool at 16,000 packs. The vale of the Severn, once famous for vineyards, is now equally so for its corn-lands, orchards, gardens, and especially its rich pastures, in which is produced the celebrated Gloucester cheese. The forest produces fine oak, timber, excellent perry and the Styrz apple cider. Chief minerals, coal and iron ore, extensively worked in the forest dist. Manufactures, besides those of Bristol, consist chiefly of the light, and also of the finest kinds of woollen cloth; and it has cotton factories. [Stroud.] Gloucestershire is divided into 29 hundreds, comprising about 350 par. in the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol. Chief cities and towns, Gloucester, Bristol, Cheltenham, Stroud, and Cirencester. Railways connect the co. town with Birmingham, via Cheltenham and Worcester; with Bristol, Dean-Forest, and London, by junction at Stroud with the Great Western Railway. A canal, the Stroud, connects the rivers Thames and Severn; another connects the cities of Gloucester and Hereford; and a third, 18 m. in length, by enabling large vessels to avoid the dangerous navigation of the Severn, brings them up to the city of Gloucester. The co. sends 6 members to House of Commons, 2 are for its E. division, 2 for its W., and 2 for its bor. Reg. electors (1845) for E. division 7,805; for W. division 7,601.

GRAMPIANS, a mountain chain in Scotland, forming the natural rampart which separates the Highlands from the Lowlands. Its limits, owing to numerous parallel ridges and scarcely connected branches, are difficult to define, but the mountains may be said to stretch from the W. coast of Argyshire and Dumbartonshire N.E. across the island, terminating on the E. and N.E. coasts of the cos. Aberdeen and Banff, in two branches running on each side of the river Dee. This mountain chain is composed of granite, porphyries, primary schists, quartz, and marble. General aspect wild and rugged, especially on the N. side; on the S. hills the slopes are more gentle, the pasture finer, and the numerous defiles which indent the range often present scenes of the most romantic beauty. The streams flowing from the N. side are mostly affs. of the Findhorn, Spey, Don, and Dee; those on the S. join the Forth, Tay, and South Esk. The loftiest summits are Ben Nevis, Ben Macdui, Cairngorm, Cairntoul, Schiehallion, Ben Avon, Ben Lawers, Ben More, and Ben Lomond; the altitudes of which are given under their respective heads.

GRANADA, an old prov. and formerly a kingdom, of Spain, Andalucía, bounded E. by Murcia, S. the Mediterranean, and on other sides the provs. of Sevilla, Cordova, and Jaen, now divided into the provs. Granada, Almería, and Málaga. Area 9,622 sq. m. Pop. (1849) 427,950. Surface mostly mountainous; the Sierra Nevada traverses its centre, and rises in Mulhacen to 11,060 feet in height. Principal rivers, the Genil, Guadalquivir, Nacimiento, and Almanzora. The hill-sides are covered with forests of oak, cork, chestnut, and pine, and in the valleys tropical, as well as European products, are cultivated. The Moorish system of irrigation is still retained, but the corn grown is insufficient for home consumption, and it is imported from Africa. The hemp is among the finest known. Mineral products comprise excellent marble, alabaster, serpentine, jasper, iron, and lead. It has manufs. of woollen, cotton, and linen stuffs, paper, and leather; anchovy and tunny fisheries are prosecuted on the coasts. Principal cities, Granada, Málaga, Almería, Ronda, Antequera, and Vélez-el-Blanco. The kingdom of Granada, the last possession of the Moors in Spain, was conquered by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492.

GRANADA, Liberia, a city of Spain, cap. of a prov. and formerly of a kingdom, and the ancient metropolis of the Moors in Spain, on the Genil, at the influx of the Darro, 120 m. E.S.E. Sevilla. Lat. 37° 16' N., lon. 3° 45' 43" W. Pop. (1845) 70,025 (in the time of the Moors it is said to have had 500,000 inhabitants). It stands partly on the edge of a plain, and partly on mountain spurs, progressively rising to the Alhambra. It resembles a Mohammedan city. Chief public edifices, the cathedral, 23 pa. churches, adorned with rich marbles and other works of art, and several convents. The Alhambra (al-kamara "the red"), or ancient palace of the Moorish kings, is an irregular mass of houses and towers on a commanding height, surrounded by groves, and of which the bastioned walls, arches, halls of the Abencerages and Ambassadors, court of lions, mesquitas, and the unfinished palace of Charles V., are the portions most worthy of notice. It has a university, 6 colleges, academies of mathematics and design, several hospitals, manuf. of silks and hats, paper mills, royal nitre and gunpowder factories, and some trade in oil. Its prosperity suffered on its being wrested from the Moors in 1492, and next, by the separation from Spain of her Indian possessions. Its principal law-courts also were removed to Alcabete in 1835.

GRANADA, a city of Central America, state and 80 m. N.N.W. Nicaragua, on the N.W. shore of the lake. Pop. (1857) 100,678. It is the seat of a trade in cacao, indigo, Nicaragua wool and hides, which are exported in flat-bottomed boats by the lake and river San Juan, to the harbour of San Juan del Norte, Caribbean Sea.

GRANADA (NEW), one of the republics of South America, mostly between the equator and lat. 12° N., lon. 68° and 82° W., having E. Venezuela, S. Ecuador, W. the Pacific, N. the Caribbean Sea, and N.W. the Central American state Costa Rica. It now comprises eight separate states. Area estimated at 521,948 sq. m., and pop. 2,363,054. The Andes, near the frontier of Ecuaador, diverge into three cordilleras, which traverse the W. and settled half of New Granada from S. to N., enclosing the basins of its principal rivers, the Atrato, Magdalena, and Cauca; on N.E. the Meta and Guaviare, tributaries of the Orinoco, flow mostly through this territory. Besides the great lake of Maracaybo, there are many other lakes N. and W. the mountains. The declivities of the Central Andes appear to be much less productive than other parts of this region; on the summits of the ranges are paramos or extensive table-lands, nearly without vegetation; the lands along the Caribbean Sea are fertile, but unhealthy; almost all the W. parts are covered with dense forests, and yield all kinds of tropical productions. In the S.E. are wide llanos or plains, pasturing innumerable herds of cattle and horses. Climate varies greatly with elevation; in some parts of the W. rains and excessive heat prevail. The uplands produce wheat and other European grains; maize, tobacco, plantains, cotton, cacao, and some sugar are raised in the river basins and along the coasts. Banileto cedar, mahogany, cinchona bark, and fastio woods, ipecacuanha and balsam of Tolu, are other vegetable products. The plains yield large supplies of jerked beef and hides. Gold is found in the Andes and in the sands of the Cauca; platinum along the Pacific; coal, silver, copper, iron, tin, lead, emeralds, and rock-salt at Zipaquara and Chita; coal near Bogotá. Manufs. are limited to coarse woollen and cotton stuffs for home consumption. The average annual value of the trade is estimated at 1,000,000; in 1844, the imports amounted in value to 680,000, the exports to 504,000. Principal commercial ports are Cartagena, Santa Martha, Panama, and Chagres. The country is divided into the 5 depts. of Cundinamarca, Magdalena, the Isthmus, Cauca, and Boyaca. After the cap. Bogotá, the principal towns are Medellín, Mompox, Quibdó, and the ports before-mentioned. It was discovered by the Spaniards in 1499, and the first settlement was made at the Gulf of Darien in 1510. In 1811 this republic was established. By the constitution of 1856 the Republic of New Granada ceased to exist under that name in June 1858, and is now known as the Granadine Confed., formed of the states of Antioquia, Bolívar, Boyaca, Cauca, Cundinamarca, Magdalena, Panama, and Santander.

GREECE or HELLAS (ΚΙΝΗΜΑΤΟΡ), ancient Grecia, a country of South-Eastern Europe, situated between lat 36° 23' and 39° 30' N., lon. 20° 45' and 28° E., bounded N. by European Turkey, from the Gulf of Volo to the Gulf of Arta, W. by the Ionian Sea and Islands, S. by the Mediterranean and the Island of Crete, and E. by the Ægean Sea. It is composed of a continental portion, comprising Hellas on the N. (the former Turkish prov. of Livadia), and the peninsula of the Morea (anc. Peloponnesus) on the S. (formerly the Turkish prov. Tripolitza), and islands in the archipelago. Pop. (1857) 1,045,252.

The following table shows the divs. and pop. in 1853, of the 10 nomarchies and 49 eparchies:—

The territory of Greece is nearly all mountainous, the culminating point of the whole is Mount Giona in Doris, lat. 38° 38' 40" N., lon. 23° 16' 24" E., 8,339 feet in elevation. The principal chain, that of Pindus, enters the country on the N., and Mount Othrys, one of its branches, forms the greater part of the N. boundary of Greece. S. of this, the principal chain turns

S.E., and forms two branches, Oeta on the N., and Parnassus on the S. Another chain extends from Cape Marathion in the Channel of Egripus, W. to the Morea, which it enters by the Isthmus of Corinth. The centre of the Morea forms an elevated table land, enclosed by three mountain chains, the most extensive of which crosses the peninsula on the N. The coasts are elevated, irregular, and deeply indented; the principal gulfs are those of Arta, Volo, Lepanto or Corinth, Ægina or the Saronic Gulf, Argolis, Laconia, Koron, and Arcadia. Chief capes, Marathon and Colonna or Sunium in Attica, Malea, Matapan, Gallo, and Klarenza in the Morea. The large island of Negropont lies along the E. side of the continent from which it is separated by a narrow channel, the other islands are partly scattered over the Ægean Sea, and partly collected with the groups of the Sporades and Cyclades. Greece has numerous streams, but they are mostly rapid and unfit for navigation. The principal are, in the north, the Aspropotamos, an affluent of the Ionian Sea, only the lower course of which belongs to Greece; the Phidaris, which flows S. to the Gulf of Patras, the Hellada, an affluent of the channel of Talanti and the Cephissus, which flow S. to the Gulf of Ægina. The chief rivers in the Morea are the Peneus and Alpheus on the W., and the Parnassus and Eurotas on the S. The only extensive lake is Topolia, ancient Copais, between Thebes and Boeotia. Climate temperate and generally healthy, except on some parts of the coasts; and in the vicinity of the lakes violent storms occur in spring and autumn. Earthquakes are rare. Winter is marked by rain in the plains and snow in the mountains. Caverns, mineral and gaseous springs are numerous. Minerals are rich and varied, but little worked; marble and other building materials are abundant.

Vegetable products vary according to elevation of the soil. The olive, fig, currant-grape of Corinth, vine, melons, rice, cotton, the orange, date, citron, and pomegranate thrive on the coasts, and in districts situated at an elevation of 1,600 feet, where also the myrtle, the mastie, and the plane-tree flourish. But agriculture is neglected. Above 6,000 feet in elevation, great part of the mountains are covered with pine forests. The principal domestic animals are sheep and goats; bees are still reared; wild animals are numerous, and game abundant. Greece has no manufactures, properly so called, but silks, cottons, woollens, coarse pottery, leather, and beet-root sugar are produced for domestic use. Salt, extracted chiefly from the lagoons of Mesolonghi, is the most important mineral product. The principal resource of the inhabitants of Greece has always been in maritime commerce. The principal ports are Athens (the Piræus), Patras, Nauplia, Syra, Kalamata, and Navarino. The people belong to the ancient Greek race in the W. of the continental portion and E. of Parnassus; in the Morea the same race prevails, but here it is more mixed. The pop. of the islands is a mixture of Albanians and Greeks. Greece was erected into a kingdom under Otto, second son of the King of Bavaria, in 1832. The government was at first nearly an absolute monarchy; the revolution of September 1843 introduced a constitution; and in March 1844, a government on the basis of those of England and France at that date, was proclaimed. The king exercises the power of the executive, and commands the army and navy. The chief tribunals are, a court of cassation at Athens, 2 royal courts, 10 tribunals of provinciales instancias, and three tribunals of commerce. The government is most inefficient, and the roads, which are wretched, except near the capital, are infested with bands of robbers. There is universal toleration for all creeds; but the Greek church is the established religion, which acknowledges the king as its temporal head, and numbers 974,102; Roman Catholic, 26,000; and Protestants, 8,000. The chief educational establishments are, the university at Athens; 6 gymnasia, at Athens, Syra, Nauplia, Patras, and Hydra; normal, polytechnic, military, and naval schools, having 750 professors, and 47,000 pupils; 22 newspapers, and 4 periodical journals are published. Public expenditure (1845) 681,104; do. revenue 554,972; deficit 106,132. In 1853 the army consisted of 9,543 men, of whom 325 were cavalry. The navy consisted of a corvette, 26 guns; 1 steam-ship, 4 guns; and 15 other vessels carrying from 8 to 3 guns. The mercantile marine had 4,230 vessels, aggregate burden 150,000 tons, employing 20,292 men.

GREENLAND, an extensive region of N.E. America, belonging to Denmark, stretching from Cape Farewell, its S. extremity, in lat. 69° 49' N., to the most northerly observed point, Eden land, lat. 78° N., and extending between lon. 30° and 76° W., having W. Baffin Bay and Davis Strait, S. and S.E. the Atlantic, and on other sides the Arctic Ocean. Pop. (1850) estimated at 9,000 Esquimaux, except about 900 Danes. Surface generally high, rocky, and barren; the elevated parts covered with perennial snow and glaciers, extending, in many parts, to the sea shores; but small quantities of corn, potatoes, and kitchen herbs are raised in the S., and some edible berries, with scattered birch, alder, and willow trees, grasses and lichens, grow wild, although July is the only month in which there is no snow. Extreme summer temperature 59°, winter minus 40°; mean annual temperature of N. and S. Greenland 27°-3, Fahr. The natives or Esquimaux, are a peculiar race, allied to the Mongolian family, of short squat stature and dark skin, employed chiefly in fishing and seal hunting. The region was first discovered by a Norwegian in 981, and soon after colonized from Iceland. Davis re-discovered Greenland in 1585, and in the 17th century the Danes re-established a communication with the lost colony. It comprises 13 Danish settlements, 6 in the S. and 7 in the N., and two missionary stations. The commerce of Greenland with Denmark is carried on with about 12 vessels. Average annual exports 3,600 tons seal-oil, 4,300 whale do., 37,000 seal, 18,000 reindeer, and 29,000 fox skins, and 19,000 lbs. of elder down. Imports chiefly wheat, brandy, tobacco, coffee, sugar, and fire-wood. The country is divided into N. and S. inspectorates, separated by the Longford, in lat. 67° N. Principal villa, Frederick's harbour, Julian's harbour, and Good Hope. Greenland is supposed to be one vast field of ice in the interior. Copper ore was recently discovered as far N. as Duxo, in lat. 70° N.

GREENLAW, a small town and pa. of Scotland, cap. co. Berwick, on the Blackadder, 18 m. W.S.W. Berwick on-Tweed. Area of pa. 25 sq. m. Pop. 1,378. The town has a county-hall and prison.

Principal structures, a custom-house; quays upwards of 2,500 feet in length, bordering the Clyde, behind which are the harbours; the town-hall, gaol, exchange, assembly-hall, theatre, infirmary, and several churches, Caeltic and many other chapels, various cotton and other mills, and warehouses. Has a mechanics' institute, several public libraries, one of which possesses 10,000 vols., and in its hall is a statue, by Chantry, of Watt, a native of the town; numerous banks, and a grammar school. One newspaper is published in the town. Its docks are very extensive. Victoria harbour was commenced in 1846, and opened in October 1850. Its water area is upwards of 6 acres, with a depth at low water of 14 feet, and of 24 feet at high water. In October 1830 the foundation stone of Sir Gabriel Wood's Mariners' Aylm was laid near the farm of Drums, in the vicinity, and opened in 1854. Ship and steamboat building is here extensively carried on. Sugar refining is an important branch of industry, and it has foundries for steam-engines and machinery; rope, sailcloth, hat, earthenware, paper, and straw-plait factories; a herring fishery, and an extensive export trade in Scotch manufactures and produce. Steam-vessels proceeding to and from Glasgow commonly touch at Greenock. Customs revenue (1848) 456,984l. Reg. shipping (1846) 437 vessels; aggregate burden 81,873 tons. In 1846, 322 ships, aggregate burden 113,895 tons, entered; and 280 ships, burden 112,053 tons, cleared out of the port. Corp. gross rev. (1848) 85,114l. It is the seat of a presbytery, sheriff's court, and a borough of barony, erected 1635. It has wholly risen into importance since the beginning of the 18th century. It sends 1 member to H. of C. It has a fine pa. church; but its chief edifice is the naval hospital, the noblest establishment of the kind in Europe, and the finest palatial structure in England. It occupies the site of the royal palace of Placentia; was commenced in the reign of Charles II., and in the reign of William III. was granted as an asylum for disabled seamen of the navy. It consists of 4 noble quadrangles between the Thames and Greenwich Park. On the river side is a terrace 865 feet in length, forming one side of the grand square; the buildings on the other sides of which are surmounted by two conspicuous domes of beautiful proportions. This hospital, which is on certain days open to the public, contains dormitories and dining-halls for about 2,700 old or disabled seamen (besides whom a much greater number of out-pensioners are supported out of the building), a chapel, with rich carved work, and a painting by West of the shipwreck of St Paul; a spacious hall 106 feet in height by 66 in breadth, decorated with representations of sea-fights, statues, and portraits of naval heroes. Detached from the edifice are the buildings of a school for the sons of naval officers and seamen. Greenwich Hospital was, in 1732, enriched with the forfeited estates of Lord Derwentwater. The management of its revenues is vested in commissioners under the Admiralty. In 1848 it amounted to 149,731l.—Greenwich Park, between the hospital and Blackheath, first enclosed by Duke Humphrey of Gloucester, protector, in the reign of Henry VI., contains about 300 acres of undulating and wooded land, and has numerous herds of deer. On one of its eminences, 160 feet above the river, is the Royal Observatory, founded by Charles II. in 1674, the residence of the astronomer royal, and from which the longitudes in all British maps and charts are reckoned. Lat. 51° 28' 6" N., lon. 0° 0' 0". Trinity Hospital, founded by the Earl of Northampton in 1613, for 20 pensioners, revenue 2,252l.; a union workhouse, market-house, and theatre. GUAYASQUIL, a dep. of the republic Ecuador, S. America, having W. the Pacific, and lands to the depa. Quito and Azuay. Estimated area 14,400 sq. m., and pop. 75,000. Surface level along the coast; the great chain of the Andes forms its E. boundary. Products, cacao, cotton, maize, tobacco, and various fruits. It is divided into the provs. Guayaquil and Manabí. Principal cities, Guayaquil and Puna.—Guayaquil, the cap. and the principal seat of trade, is on the coast, and on rt. b. of the Guayaquil river, 40 m. above its mouth, in the Gulf of Guayaquil. Lat. 2° 20' 28" S., lon. 79° 45' W. Estimated pop. 16,000. It is well laid out, and has some good public edifices; but it is mostly built of wood, and on low ground, ill supplied with water, unhealthy, and infested with vermin. Its harbour is one of the best on the Pacific, and defended by 3 forts; and it has some convenient building-docks. The tide rises here sometimes to 24 feet, and large ships can ascend to the town. Exports consist of cacao, timber, hides, tobacco, ecibo-wool, and cattle. The country inland is hence supplied with wine, brandy, Peruvian and Chilian sugar, and European merchandise, which goods are carried by water to the head of the river navigation at Babahoyd or Caracoli.—The Gulf of Guayaquil is an inlet of the Pacific, mostly between lat. 2° and 4° S., lon. 80° and 81° W. It receives the Guayaquil, Daule, and Tumbura rivers, and contains the islands Puna and Santa Clara.

GUERNSEY, the second in size of the Channel or Anglo-Norman Islands, in the Bay of St Michael, 30 m. W. the coast of Normandy, 51 m. S. of Portland, English coast, and 15 m. W.N.W. Jersey. Area 16,000 ac. Pop. 29,757. Its form is triangular, and its coast line, of about 80 m. in circumference, is deeply indented with bays, and surrounded by sunken rocks. Surface gently varied, but generally sloping from the S.—where the cliffs are lofty—to the N. coast, which is low. It is well watered. Soil rests on a structure almost everywhere granitic, and is, with the aid of sea-weed manure, rendered very fertile. Climate moist, but healthy, and so mild, that oranges, melons, figs, myrtles, and the Guernsey lily, flourish luxuriantly. Wood is not plentiful, fences are commonly of stone or turf, and in the N. are many tracts of heath. Farms average from 5 to 13 ac, the land being greatly subdivided under the law which gives to each son an equal share in his father's landed property. Rents vary from 10s. to 10l. an ac. Chief crops are vegetables, wheat, barley, and apples for cider. The orchards likewise furnish pasture for the famous breed of cows, which are larger and more valued than even those of Alderney, and yield, on an average, 1 lb. of the finest butter per day, throughout the year. Swine are numerous. Manufactures are of no importance. Trade, or rather smuggling, has greatly declined since 1807, when the exports from these islands were made subject to our general revenue laws. The shipping, which in 1845, comprised 190 vessels, averaging 110 tons each, was mostly employed in importing British manure, and in exporting cider, potatoes, cattle, and granite. They also carry South American produce to the Mediterranean, in exchange for wine, which is again exchanged in Hamburg for corn. Custom duties are moderate, and provisions extremely cheap. Steamers ply between Guernsey and London, Southampton, Plymouth, and Weymouth. The isl. is divided into 10 par., forming a deanery of the church of England, in diocese of Winchester. St Peter, on the S.E. coast, is the only town in the island. The natives of the lower orders speak the old Norman French; they have long been remarkable for their adherence to Protestantism. The island is under a lieutenant-governor, who represents the sovereign in the assembly of the states, a parliamentary body composed of 13 jurats, with 8 rectors and 2 constables of each parish, and 139 douzainers from the whole island. These have the power, with the sanction of the Crown, of making laws and imposing taxes. The latter are very moderate, producing an annual rev. of about 10,000l. The royal court has jurisdiction over all the Channel Islands except Jersey. Guernsey formed a part of the Duchy granted by Charles the Simple to the Norman Rollo, to whose descendants it has now belonged for nearly 1,000 years. It is defended by strong fortifications, and has a well-organized militia.

GUIANA, GUYANA or GUAYANA, a wide region of South America, comprising all of that continent between the Amazon or Orinoco rivers, extending from lat. 3° 30' S. to 8° 40' N., lon. 50° to 68° W., and subdivided into Brazilian (formerly Portuguese), British, Dutch, French, and Venezuelan (formerly Spanish) Guianas; it was discovered towards the end of the 16th century. The Dutch formed the first settlement in 1590, near Demerara river, the English in 1590, near Berbice and Surinam. In 1667, the English settlements were given up to the Dutch, but again re-occupied by the English; and in 1814, the settlements between the Corentyn and Marony rivers were restored to the Dutch.

GUIANA (BRAZILIAN), comprises the N. part of the Brazilian dom., between lat. 3° 50' S., and 4° 30' N., lon. 50° and 68° W., bounded N. by the Sierras Juraguaca, Pacaraima, and Acarau, which separate it from the other divisions of Guiana, W. and S. by the Rio Negro and Amazon rivers, and having E. the Atlantic. Area roughly estimated at 433,000 sq. m. It is traversed by the Rio Branco, and numerous other rivers; is mostly covered by a dense vegetation; peopled chiefly by roving Indian tribes, and divided between the provs. Para and Rio Negro, which last territory, however, can scarcely be considered as actually under Brazilian rule.

GUIANA (BRITISH), a colonial territory on the N.W. coast of South America, belonging to Great Britain, and generally considered to extend from the Atlantic between lat. 6° and 8° 40' N., on the southward on lat. $0^{\circ} 40'$ N., lon. 57° and 61° W., having E. Dutch, S. Brazilian, and W. Venezuelan Guiana, and comprising an area of 16,000 sq. m., but the possession of much of this has been disputed by Brazil and Venezuela. The African negroes are more numerous than the Europeans. The amount of the native tribes unknown. Pop. of the settled portion 88,133; exclusive of Indians, 30,980. During 1853, 49,000 emigrants arrived here from Great Britain. Surface, near the ocean, a rich alluvial flat, and extending in mud banks into the sea. This plain extends inland from 10 to 40 m.; it then ascends by successive terraces to the Sierras Pacaraima and Acarai, on the S.W. and S. frontiers; near the W. boundary Mount Roraima rises to an elevation of 7,500 feet. Principal rivers, the Essequibo, Demerara, Berbice, and Corentyne, the last forming its E. border. There are two rainy seasons on the coast, the greater, from December to February, followed by a lesser till April, when the great rains prevail again from May till the end of July. In the interior there is only one rainy season, from April till the middle of August. Temperature ranges from 75° to 90° . Mean temperature of the year 81° Fahr. Prevailing wind, N.E., changes in rainy season to W. The vegetation is most luxuriant. Principal products, sugar, along the coast, and which has progressively superseded there the culture of cotton and coffee, though the latter is still extensively grown on the uplands; rice, maize, wheat, cacao, vanilla, tobacco, and cinnamon are also raised. Total value of exports (1844) 1,131,346*l.*, of which amount those to Great Britain stood for 1,094,003*l.* Value of imports, 675,950*l.* In the same year, 550 ships, aggregate burden, 87,987 ton, entered; and 569 do., burden, 85,948 tons, cleared from the ports of the colony. Government vested in a governor, council, and the orders of the sovereign in council; the laws of the Netherlands are those mostly in force. Public revenue (1846) 900,000 dollars. The colony is divided into the coas. Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo; chief towns, George Town, the cap., and New Amsterdam.

GUIANA (Dutch) or SURINAM, a colonial territory, N.W. coast of South America, belonging to the Netherlands, between lat. $1^{\circ} 30'$ and 6° N., lon. $53^{\circ} 30'$ and $57^{\circ} 30'$ W., having E. French, W. English, and S. Brazilian Guiana. Area 10,400 sq. m. Pop. 60,000, of whom 6,500 were whites, including many Jews; and 53,500 negroes. Slavery has recently been abolished here by the Dutch government, but in lieu of compensation to their proprietors, the slaves remain apprenticed for twelve years, and work without wages. Natural features are like those of British Guiana. Principal rivers, the Surinam, in its centre, Marony, on the E., and Corentyne, on the W. frontier. Exports cotton, sugar, coffee, molasses, and rum, to the value of (1849) 2,997,006*l.* Cotton, cacao, rice, cassava, and yams are raised; and other products are fine woods, gums, drugs, and timber. Imports come chiefly from the Netherlands, though there is some traffic with the West India islands. Government vested in a governor-general, and a high council. Chief town, Paramaribo; principal port, Amsterdam.

GUIANA (French), forms the E. most colonial subdivision of Guiana, between lat. 2° and 6° N., lon. $51^{\circ} 30'$ and $54^{\circ} 30'$ W., having E. and S. Brazil, W. Dutch Guiana, and N.E. the Atlantic. Area 10,980 sq. m. Pop. in 1836, 21,170; in 1854, 16,741. Surface rises progressively on proceeding inland, and the middle region of the colony is from 1,000 to 2,000 feet above the sea. Rivers numerous, and the coast lands appear to be less unhealthy than in British Guiana. Cultivated lands are estimated to occupy 1-80th part of the whole. Products comprise sugar, cotton, coconuts, coffee, cloves, annatto, vanilla, pepper, cinnamon, nutmegs, dyewoods, manioc, rice, maize, and bananas. Government vested in a governor, privy council, and colonial council. French Guiana is divided into the districts Cayenne and Sinnamary. Chief town, Cayenne, the cap.; the rest are insignificant. By a decree of March 1842, the colony was made a place of banishment for French political offenders, 2,600 of whom were sent out in that year. Pop. (with the isl. of Cayenne) 22,010; 14,967 of whom were emancipated slaves.

GUIANA (Venezuelan) or COLOMBIAN GUIANA, the N.W. subdivision of Guiana, comprising most of the country between lat. 2° and $8^{\circ} 40'$ N., lon. 60° and 68° W., or more than half of the Venezuelan dominions, having S. the Sierras Pacaraima and Iraguaca, separating it from Brazil, W. and N. the Orinoco. N.E. the Atlantic, and E. British Guiana, the mutual boundary being disputed. Area estimated at 188,500 sq. m. Pop. estimated at 20,000, of whom 16,000 are roving Indians. It forms most part of the dep. Orinoco; principal towns, Angaitua, Piedra, and San Fernando de Apure.

GUINEA, a geographical division of Western Africa, comprising the coast of the Atlantic Ocean, from Cape Negro, lat. 15° 41' S., to Cape Verga, at 10° 20' N. It is divided into Cyper or N. Guinea, and Lower or S. Guinea; N. Guinea extending from lat. 10° 20' N. to lat. 1° S., and between lon. 14° 30' W. and 10° E., is bounded by Senegambia and Soudan on the N. and N. E., the Atlantic on the W. and S. W., and South Guinea on the S. E. The coasts are in general low and unhealthy, but very fertile. The Kong mountains are believed to extend from E. to W. along the N. boundary. Principal rivers, the Niger or Quorra, the delta of which is on the Calabar coast, the Volta and Assinie. The S. and W. coasts are watered by numerous small streams. The chief products of the country consist in gold dust, indigo, pepper, cotton, and the sugar cane. The forests contain the elephant, lion, tiger, rhinoceros, and serpents. The coasts from N. to S. are called Liberia, Grain coast, Ivory coast, Gold coast, Slave coast, and the Calabar coast. The interior is divided into numerous native states, the chief of which are the kingdoms of Ashantee, Dahomey and Benin. Fetishism is the prevailing superstition. The principal European settlements are Accra, Cape Coast Castle, Dixcove, Elmina, and Sierra Leone. On the S. W. coast is the American settlement of Liberia. South Guinea extends from lat. 1° to 16° 41' S., lon. 8° 50' to 18° (?) E. It is bounded on the E. by elevated mountains, covered with forests. The chief rivers are the Zaire and Congo, the sources of which are unknown. The W. plains are watered by numerous small rivers. The mountains are said to contain iron and copper. Vegetation is rich. The principal states of South Guinea are Loango, Congo, Angola, and Benguela. This country was discovered by the Portuguese in 1482, and they have retained nominal possession of the S. districts.

It is of a very irregular form, and composed of two principal portions, separated by Brunswick. The N. portion is bounded N. by the German Ocean, E. by Denmark, Hamburg, and Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Prussia, and part of Brunswick; S. by Brunswick, Waldeck, Lippe-Deimold, Hessen Cassel, and Prussian Westphalia; W. by the Netherlands. The S. portion is bounded N. by Brunswick, S. and E. by Prussia and Brunswick, and S. and W. by Hessen Cassel. Enclosed within the territory is the grand duchy of Oldenburg, the free town of Bremen, and part of Brunswick. It is divided into six landroets. Area and pop. as follow:—

Landroet.	Area in sq. m.	Pop. 1822.	Chief Town.
Hanover, . .	9,892	940,000	Hanover.
Hildesheim, . .	1,798	227,593	Hildesheim.
Lüneburg, . .	4,344	225,754	Lüneburg.
Stade, . .	2,020	87,624	Stade.
Osnabrück, . .	3,610	221,000	Osnabrück.
Aurich, . .	1,154	125,139	Aurich.
Mining District,	244	35,730	Glückshaus.
Total, . .	14,946	1,519,335	- -

Surface flat in the N., forming part of the great plain of Germany; and mountainous in the S., where it is covered by objects of the Harz, highest point the Königshorn, 3,960 feet in elevation above the sea. The coasts are under the level of the sea, from the encroachments of which they are protected by dykes. The country is watered by three of the chief rivers of Germany.—1. the Elbe, with its affluents the Oste, Ilmenau, and Jetze; 2. the Weser, affluents the Wümm, Leine, Aller, Ocker, Innerste, and Hunte; 3. Ems, affluents the Hase and the Vechte, which flows to the Zuyder Zee. On the N. are extensive marshes and numerous lakes; the mountainous portion is rich in metals. Climate humid, mild in the N., and cold in the S. Mean temperature 48° F., extremes 64° F. to 32° F. Soil generally poor, is most fertile in Bremen and East Friesland, near the coast. Chief products, barley and oats, potatoes, rye, and vegetables, tobacco, hops, chicory, flax, and hemp. There are extensive forests of firs in the Harz, and of oak and beech at Solling. Cattle form one of the chief sources of wealth of the country, and they are an important article of export. The horses of East Friesland, which are celebrated, are bred for exportation, and there is a government stud at Celle. The sheep are of improved breeds, and geese are extensively reared in the polders; bees yield valuable produce in Meppen, Lüneburg, and Verden. The lakes and rivers abound in fish. Mining is the most important branch of industry, the chief products are the metals of the Harz, including iron, copper, lead, litharge, salt, turf, coal, alum, marble, and granite. There are several mineral springs, some of which have establishments of baths. The principal manufs. are linen, hemp, woollen, and cotton fabrics, paper, soap, leather, and hats. Brewing and the manuf. of metals are important branches of industry. Although advantageously situated on the North Sea, and traversed by navigable rivers, the commerce of Hanover is not extensive. It is conducted mostly by the towns of Bremen and Hamburg. Emden is the chief port. Principal exports, linens, yarns, and agricultural produce. Imports comprise manufactured goods, colonial produce, wine, and spirits. Besides the navigable rivers, Hanover is traversed by excellent roads, and railways connect the cap. with Hamburg in the N., Brunswick in the E., and Hildesheim in the S. The pop. in the S. belong to the Saxon race, and in the N.W. to the Frisians. In 1852, there were 1,494,033 Lutheran, 95,320 Reformed, 217,367 Roman Catholics, 11,562 Jews, and 1,071 of other denominations. Public instruction is placed under the direction of a superior council; there were, in 1845, 3,561 primary schools, numerous industrial and secondary, polytechnic and elementary schools, 17 gymnasia, 13 progymnasias, and 3,561 town and country schools. The national seat of learning is the university of Göttingen. There is a school of mines and forestry at Klausthal, military and veterinary schools, schools of midwifery, and 5 normal schools. At the dissolution of the French empire, Hanover, having reverted to its former sovereign, the French system of administration was abolished, and the old régime re-established. In 1813, the prov. states voted a constitution, modelled on those of England and France, and in 1833 a new constitution was promulgated. In 1837, Ernest, Duke of Cumberland, having been called to the throne, on the death of King William IV. of England, in virtue of the salique law, abrogated the new constitution, re-established that of 1819, and convoked a new parliament. In consequence of the revolutionary movements of 1848-9, several important modifications in the gov. have taken place. Public revenue (1854-5), estimated at 8,890,375 dollars; expenditure, 8,861,125 dollars; public debt (1853) 38,093,412 dollars. Armed force, 3,270 cavalry, 13,860 infantry, 198 engineers, and 1,449 artillery.

HAYTI, HAITI, ST DOMINGO or HISPANIOLA, an independent island, and the largest in the West Indies, except Cuba, from which it is separated W. by the windward passage, and E. from Porto Rico by the Mona passage, and having N. the Atlantic Ocean, and S. the Caribbean Sea. It is nearly 400 m. long, and from 60 to 150 m. broad. Area 29,500 sq. m. Pop. (1855) 663,000, of whom 493,000 were blacks, 42,000 mulattoes, and 28,000 whites. The centre is occupied by a mountainous region. Mount Chaco attaining an elevation of upwards of 6,000 feet above the sea, and parallel mountain chains traverse the island. Here are several extensive plains, Les Plaines, in the S.E., being 80 m. in length, and the plain of Artibonite, in the W., watered by the Artibonite, the chief river. The other considerable rivers are the Monte Christ, Guma, and Neive. There are several lakes in the S., and the soil generally is well watered. Shores swampy in the E., elsewhere mostly bold, and surrounded by reefs, though there are several excellent harbours in the W., where two long projecting peninsulas enclose the large bay of Gonaves. Climate tropical, and on the plains very unhealthy to Europeans. There are but two seasons, the rainy season, May to June, and the dry season; the spring, April to June, is the finest season. Hurricanes are common, especially in August and September. The soil is highly fertile, and a great part of the island is covered by dense forests of mahogany, iron-wood, log-wood, cedar, and other valuable timber trees. Products comprise the plantain, vanilla, and manioc; but cultivation and wealth had so much declined, that, in 1826, the exports fell far below those of 1789, when the island was a French colonial possession, and at the height of its prosperity. In 1836, 37,662,674 lbs. of coffee, 6,767,903 do. of log-wood, 4,854,944 feet of mahogany, 1,223,716 lbs. of tobacco, besides cotton, cocoa, cigars, sugar, rags, wax, and ginger, formed the chief exports. Imports comprise British manufactures of most kinds; wines, liqueurs, silks, and other French manufactures; linen fabrics, bagging, woollens, Russian wines, and mineral waters from Germany; and lumber, provisions, hides, colonial produce, from the U. S. In 1836 the imports at the principal port were estimated at 474,732, and the exports at 921,836. Gold, silver, copper, tin, iron, and rock salt are found in the island, but the mines are now unproductive. The government, nominally republican, is in reality a military despotism, the power of the elective president greatly outweighing those of the senate and house of representatives. The high court of justice sits in Port-au-Prince, the cap., where also, and at Cayes, St Domingo, Gonaves, Jeremie, Jacmel, and St Jago, the other principal towns, are provincial, civil, and criminal courts. The Roman Catholic is the established religion, but all others are tolerated. Public revenue in 1849 amounted to 4,623,890 francs. Expenditure, 5,421,420 francs. The debt to France was in 1838 fixed at 60,000,000 francs, to be discharged by six instalments, three of which were in 1846 paid up. Hayti was discovered by Columbus, Dec. 5, 1493, and on its N. coast was planted the first colony established by Europeans in the W. hemisphere. Spain held possession of the island until 1625, when the French obtained a share, and from this period till 1793, the island was the most flourishing of all Indian colonies. After this a revolution of the black people took place, the independence of Hayti was proclaimed in 1800, and the French were finally expelled in 1803. Since that period a series of revolutions have occurred, and a sort of elective military government has prevailed under various leaders, the longest, most vigorous and beneficial, under Christophe. Education and civilization are at a low ebb, the population are extremely indolent, and the arts and comforts of life little cultivated. In 1846 the Spanish part of the island declared the government of "Demimica" to be not military, but civil, republican, and representative, with a president, legislative assembly, and council. Hayti, formerly the French portion of the island, was proclaimed an empire, under its former President, Faustin I., in August 1849.

HEBRIDES or WESTERN ISLANDS, Evude, a series of islands off the W. coast of Scotland, between lat. 55° 33' and 58° 34' N., lon. 5° and 8° W., and consisting of two principal groups; the Outer Hebrides,—Lewis, Harris, N. and S. Uist, Benbecula, Barra, and numerous smaller islands in the co. Ross and Inverness; and the inner Hebrides,—Skye, Rum, Eigg, Canna, Coll, Tiree, Mull, Iona, Colonsay, Jura, Arran, Bute, etc., partly separated from the former by the channel termed the Little Minch, and lying more immediately off the shores of Inverness and Argyll, in which coa. and in Bute-shire they are included. Total number, not including the smaller islets, 180, 70 of which are permanently inhabited. Total area estimated about 3,000 sq. m. Pop. probably 115,000. Of 1,592,000 acres of surface, mountains, morasses, lakes, and unproductive soil have been computed to occupy 600,000 ac., pastures 700,000 do., and arable land only 180,000. Geologically the Hebrides are divided into several groups.—The Gneiss Islands comprehend the whole of the Outer Hebrides, Lewis, Harris, N. and S. Uist, Tuce, Coll, Iona, etc.—The Trap Islands are Skye, Rum, Eigg, Canna, Mull, Uivsta, Staffa, and St Kilda.—The Slate Islands are Islay, Jura, Gigha, Colonsay, etc.—The Clyde Islands, consisting of trap, sandstone, and limestone, are Bute, Arran, Cumbray, and Ailsa. Climate moist in Outer Hebrides, much rain in winter, but little snow. Soil of the Gneiss Islands poor, and often peat moss; the trap and sandstone islands more fertile. Pop. for the most part Celtic, and generally in the greatest poverty, 4-5ths subsisting almost wholly on potatoes and fish. The introduction of steam navigation has contributed very much to the improvement of the Inner Hebrides. The herring fishery, formerly an important resource of the people, has greatly declined, as has also the manuf. of kelp, of which, at the beginning of the present century, nearly 6,000 tons were produced, fetching sometimes 30s. per ton. Other manufs. are insignificant and wholly domestic, except some production of cotton stuffs at Rothesay, distilling in Islay, and boat-building at Tobermory and Stor-noway. The rearing of cattle and sheep is the most profitable branch of industry, and the stock of each is estimated at 120,000. Live stock, ponies, kelp, wool, cod, ling, herrings, limestone, and slate, are the chief exports; imports are iron, groceries, salt, oatmeal, and in some of the islands peat-fuel. A few years ago, the Hebrides had 6 branch banks, but no printing press or newspaper, and "the greater number of the islands are destitute of surgeons, or even of inns." They are divided into 26 quoad civitas paa. In the Outer Hebrides especially, most of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics. Principal villa., Stornoway in Lewis, Portree in Skye, Tobermory in Mull, and Rothesay in Bute. These islands were ruled mostly by sovereigns of Norwegian descent from the 9th century till 1264, when they were annexed to the crown of Scotland. The principal islands are noticed under their respective names.

HESKINGS (New), an isl. group, Pacific Ocean, between lat. 14° and 20° S., lon. 168° and 170° E., and E. ward of New Caledonia and the Malicollu group. Principal islands comprise Ambrym, Annaton, Erromango, Tanna, and Aurora. The natives are of the Papuan race.

HECLA or HEKLA (Mount) a volcano of Iceland, near its S.W. coast. Lat. 63° 59' N., lon. 19° 49' W. Height above the sea 5,210 feet, it being surrounded by many much higher mtns. It has 3 peaks, little elevated above its body, and along its sides are numerous craters, the seats of former eruptions; the crater of its principal peak does not much exceed 100 feet in depth. It is composed chiefly of basalt and lava; but slag-sand and loose ashes cover a great part of its surface, and obsidian is among its most remarkable products. Since A.D. 900, 43 of its eruptions are on record, of which 5 have been simultaneous, or nearly so, with those of Vesuvius, 4 with those of Ætna, and 1 with those of both. Its last eruption commenced 23 Sept. 1845, and lasted till 6th April 1846; on the 23d of Nov. the torrent of lava, 2 m. from the crater, was 1 m. in width, and from 40 to 50 feet in depth.

HESEN-CASSEL or ELECTORAL HESSEN (Germ. Kurhessen), a state of Germany, comprised between lat. 49° 56' and 52° 26' N., lon. 8° 25' and 10° 8' E. Cap. Cassel. It is composed of six isolated portions, the largest of which, comprising Hessen Proper, and including the cap., is bounded E. by Saxe-Weimar and Bavaria, S. by Frankfurt and Hessen-Darmstadt, W. by Nassau, Hessen, and Waldeck, N. by Prussia and Hanover. The two principal detached portions are Schmalkalden and Schaumburg, and the smaller Barchfeld, Dorchum and Katzenberg. Area, 4,439 sq. m. Pop. (1-55) 736,392. Surface elevated and mountainous: the Meissner S.E. of Almerode, 2,325 ft. in elevation, is the highest point of Hessen Proper, and the Inselberg, one of the summits of the Thüringer-Wald, on the frontier of Schmalkalden, is the culminating point of the state. The territory is situated in the basin of the North Sea, and is drained by the Weser and the Rhine. The chief rivers are (1st), the Weser, with its two upper branches, the Werra and the Fulda; (2d), the Main and the Lahn, affluents of the Rhine. Among the others are the Diemel, the Eder, with the Schwalm, and the Haune, affs. of the Fulda; the Ohm, aff. of the Lahn; the Nidda and the Kinzig, affs. of the Main. Climate generally cold, except in the valley of the Main. Mean temperature at Fulda, year 46°, winter 27°.5, summer 65°.5, Fahr. Soil is generally infertile, except in the valleys of the principal rivers. Schmalkalden is almost entirely unproductive. Chief crops, rye, barley, oats, wheat, maize, potatoes, lint, hemp, and tobacco. Fruit of all kinds is abundant in the prov. Hanaa, where cider is made. The vine is cultivated in the prov. Hanaa; it ripens also in the valley of the Werra, near Wittenhausen, the N. most point of its cultivation in Germany. Forests occupy one-third of the territory. The principal timber is oak, elm and beech. Cattle rearing is the most important branch of rural industry. Agriculture is in a backward state. Hessen-Cassel possesses many of the most useful minerals; the chief are iron, coal, salt; gold in small quantities is found in the sands of the Eder; silver mines, once worked, are long since abandoned, and only one copper mine is in operation. In Sohmalkalder, there are seven high furnaces producing iron of excellent quality; in the rest of the state there are other five high furnaces. The chief coal mines are in the prov. of Lower Hessen. Turf is abundant, and is mostly used for fuel. It has numerous mineral springs, and the sulphur baths of Neundorf are among the best frequented in N. Germany. Manufs. have been greatly extended since the state joined the German customs union. The most important are linen fabrics, called Osnaburgs, flannels, carpets, cotton, and silks, velvets, manufs. of iron and steel goods of every description, paper, wooden wares, pianos, chemical products, tobacco, beet-root sugar, pottery, and jewellery. Chief exports, linens, carpets, jewellery, iron and steel goods. Imports colonial goods, cotton, silk, wine, and brandy. The chief branch of commerce is in the transit of goods, which is facilitated by the navigable rivers Main, Weser, Werra, and Fulda, and by railways. In 1833 Hessen-Cassel and Hessen-Darmstadt united with Prussia to form the origin of the German customs union. The chief educational establishments are the university at Marburg, the military and polytechnic school at Cassel, and the theological seminary at Fulda. Numerous elementary schools have recently been established, and the state is not now behind the neighbouring countries in respect of education. Hessen-Cassel is a constitutional monarchy, the title of the sovereign is Prince Elector of Hessen. The state is divided into the provs. Lower Hessen, with Schaumburg, Upper Hessen, Fulda, and Hanau. Army 7,064 men, of whom 847 are cavalry. HIMĀLAYA or HIMĀLAH MOUNTAINS ("the dwelling of snow," the Jumaws of the ancients), extend along the N. boundary of Hindostan, and form the most elevated mountain-chain in the world. They are situated between lat. 27° and 36° N., lon. 73° and 95° E. The Hindoo Koosh range is continuous with the Himālaya mountains on the W., and on the E. they extend into Assam. The length of the range is estimated at 1,500 m.; the breadth, as far as ascertained, varies from 100 m. to 350 m. The range lies between the low alluvial plain of India on the S., drained by the Ganges and the Brahmaputra, and the elevated table-land of Tibet on the N. and N.E. The mountains terminate on the S. towards the plain of the Ganges, in a wall-like range, from 4,000 to 5,000 feet high, broken up, at intervals, by deep precipitous chasms, through which the springs and rivers, formed from the melted snows in the interior, flow down with great impetuosity. Between these and the higher ranges lie the fertile and well-cultivated valleys of Nepal, Bhotan, and Assam. To the N., the enormous masses are separated from one another by the valleys of Cashmere, the Indus, and the Sutlej. The mean elevation of the range has been estimated at from 16,000 to 20,000 feet. Forty of the peaks exceed 20,000 feet. Several reach a height of 25,000 feet, Mt. Everest is 29,003 feet, Dhaulagiri is 26,832 feet, Kitchinjunga 28,156 feet, Jawahir 26,670 feet, Jamantri 26,500, feet, and Chumalari 23,945 feet. The high table-land of Tibet, forming the N. portion of the range, has a more gradual and extensive slope than the steep and abrupt mountain declivities of the S. The Himālaya maintains a considerable height and breadth along the N. of Assam, but beyond this point nothing certain is known of the range. The passes, of which there are several across the Himālaya, are at high elevations. Karakorum pass is 18,600 feet, Parangia 18,500 feet, Doora Ghaut 17,750 feet, and Nil Ghaut 16,814 feet. The difficulty of these ascents is extreme, especially that of the Niti Pass, which leads to Manse, the sacred Lake of Tibet. The base and summits, and probably the great mass of this range, consist of granite and crystalline-stratified rocks. A zone of silurian strata prevails at elevations of 15,000 to 18,000 feet, and tertiary strata, some of very modern date, with many organic remains, occur at various elevations along the ridge. The lower limits of the snow line is on the southern side at an elevation of 12,932 feet, while on the northern it is 16,520 feet. Vegetation also extends much higher on the N. than on the S. side. This arises from the serenity and dryness of the air, and the radiated heat from the extensive sloping table-land towards the N., while on its S. there are more frequent gales and moisture, and an abrupt precipitous termination of the mountains. Some of the peaks in the interior are free of snow, and the contrast of this with the other snow-covered summits, and the deep azure of the sky, renders the scenery most magnificent. The base of the mountains to the E. is covered with a dense, impenetrable jungle, separating them from the plains of India. This belt diminishes to the W. and N. of the Jumna. Cultivation is carried to the foot of the mountains. At the level of the base the vegetation is of a tropical character; at an elevation of 5,000 feet, European plants succeed. Here rice and other grains are cultivated; as also a species of arum, the roots of which form the food of the Hill-people, and wheat grows at an elevation of 12,000 feet. The cultivation of the tea plant has been introduced successfully in the Kumaon and Gurwahl districts. Herds of cattle are numerous, and especially sheep and goats. Mines of iron, lead, and copper exist, but have been little wrought or explored.

Beyond these are Wyken on the W. Sculcoates on the N., both containing populous quarters of the modern town; and beyond the Hull, on the E., are Sutton and Drifpool, with a large citadel occupying the E. angle, formed by the Hull and Humber. Here several good streets, extensive warehouses, impeded by narrow lanes, border the river Hull along which the town and suburbs Drifpool and Sculcoates extend for nearly 2 miles from the Humber. The docks, constructed successively since 1775, on the site previously occupied by fortifications, have an aggregate length of 1,067 yards, breadth varying from 260 to 400 feet, and a total area of 34 acres, besides a basin between two of the piers on the Humber; they are surrounded by broad quays and large warehouses, have a depth varying at high tides from about 20 to 27 feet, and are crowded with shipping of all nations. Holy Trinity church is a cruciform building, with a pinnacled tower 140 feet in height. There are about 10 other churches, many dissenting chapels, a Jews' synagogue, and a floating chapel for mariners. Amongst the most conspicuous public buildings are the custom-house, exchange, pilot, dock, excise, and stamp offices, the infirmary, two theatres, concert-hall, colleges, work-houses, gaol, mansion-house, new baths and wash-houses, terminals of the Hull and Selby Railway. The Trinity guild founded in 1368, for decayed seamen and their widows, has an elegant edifice in the Tuscan order, museum, a school for boys destined for the merchant service, and dwellings for pensioners.—Hull has numerous hospitals and other charitable institutions, a charter-house founded in 1380; Hull and Kingston colleges, which give instruction similar to King's and University colleges, London, and have two elegant buildings in the N.W. suburb; a medical school, a grammar school, a dispensary, penitentiary, and lying-in charity. A public subscription library, mechanics' institute, lyceum, and atheneum, all having libraries, a sailors' institute, and a savings' bank. Hull is connected by railways with Scarborough, Whitby, York, and all the manufacturing towns of the West Riding, for the export of manufs. of which it is the great outlet; and it has been lately put in more ready communication with London and the centre of England, by a continuation of the Eastern Counties Railway to New Holland, on the opposite bank of the Humber, 2½ m. distant. The Trent, Ouse, Don, etc., tributaries of the Humber, and navigable canals, connect it also with a large inland territory. Principal exports are cotton and woollen stuffs and yarn, earthenwares, hardware, metals, rapeseed, and corn, the latter chiefly imported previously; with wool, bones, timber, hemp, flax, madder, skins, and other produce. Its coasting trade is highly important, and it receives large quantities of coal. Its merchants were the first in England who embarked in the northern whale fishery, but these fisheries have greatly declined. It communicates by steam-packets with London, Yarmouth, Leth, Berwick, Aberdeen, Hamburg, Rotterdam, and Copenhagen, many times weekly, and also constantly with Selby, Goole, Gainsborough, York, and Grimsby. In 1845, 1,151 British ships, aggregate burden 268,071 tons, and 1,015 foreign vessels, burden 120,744 tons,—total 2,166 ships, burden 388,815 tons, entered the port; and in the same year the total value of British and Irish produce exported from Hull amounted to 10,728,566. Customs revenue (1845) 493,902. Has large cotton and flax mills. Ship-building and its auxiliary manufs. are extensively carried on, and here are foundries, tanneries, potteries, some large breweries, sugar refineries, soap and gun works, and various corn and oil mills, many in the E. suburbs impelled by wind. The town has a branch of the Bank of England, many other banks, and several weekly newspapers. The borough is divided into 6 wards, and governed by a mayor, 15 aldermen, and 43 competitors. It has quarter-masters, and a court of requests. Hall returns 3 members to House of Commons. This town, under the name of Myton-wyk, appears to have been of importance in the time of Athelstan; but its consequences as a port dates from the time of Edward I., who conferred on it the royal designation, Kingston. In the civil war of Charles I., it was the first town to close its gates against the king, and it successfully sustained two sieges of the royal troops, in 1643 and 1648.—II. (Applenton), a township, co. Chester, pa. Great Budworth, 8 m. N.N.W. Northwich. Pop. 1,828.—III. (Bishop's), a pa., co. Somerset, 1½ m. W. Taunton. Area 1,670 ac. Pop. 1,877.—The Hull River, England, co. York, East Riding, rises near Great Driffield, flows S., passing near Beverley, with which it communicates by a short canal, and after a total course of 39 m., enters the Humber on the E. side of Kingston-upon-Hull, of which it forms the harbour here, is lined with warehouses for about 1 m. from the Humber. HUNGARY (Magyar Ország, German Ungarn, French Hongrie, anc. Pannonia, etc.), a country of Central Europe, situated between lat. 44° 45' and 49° 34' N., lon. 14° 25' and 25° E., cap. Pesth. It is bounded N. by the Carpathian mountains, which separate it from Galicia, E. and S. by Moldavia and Wallachia, S. by Turkey, S.W. by Dalmatia and the Adriatic, and W. by Illyria, Styria, Lower Austria, Moravia, and Austrian Silesia. Within these limits are comprised—I. Hungary proper, including civil Slavonia, Croatia, and the Hayduke districts.—II. Transylvania.—III. the military frontier. In 1848, Hungary proper had 45 counties and 5 dists. Beyond (or on the west side of) the Danube, 11 count.: Wieselburg, Odenburg, Raab, Komorn, Weispritz, Weisenburg, Eisenburg, Szalad, Szeged, Tolna, and Szekes. On this side (or north and east of) the Danube, to the Theiss, 13 count.: Pesth, Bacs, Nagyard, Solih, North-Gran, Bara, Munkacs, Presburg, Trencsén, Thurcoa, Arva, and Lipan. On this side (or north and west) the Theiss, 11 count.: Sips and the towns of Black Croatia, Lower Danube, Temes, Abodjavar, Sand, Bozanka, Ujpest, and Beregh. Beyond the limit of the Thais, 12 counts: Marmaros, Sáros, Neuhäusel, Neuhäusel, Biller, Bekes, Chonag, Comand, Arad, Krasna, Temesvar, and Ujpest (the 3 last form the dist. of Banat). Slavonia, 3 counts: Syrnia, Verona, and Pescara. Croatia, 3 counts: Kreutz, Varasdin, and Agram. Serbia Dists: Jasygia (Great and Little), Gomadea, 7 Heyduke towns and the Hungarian Litorale (or sea coast). Area 23,434 sq. m. Pop. 2,073,737. — Military Frontier. Pop. 1,747,733. Total pop. (1848) 15,787,944. The Carpathians form a natural boundary on the N. of Hungary, and their ramifications render this part of the country a mountainous region. They have different names in the 33 counties which they traverse. The most important for their metals are the mountains of Barsch, Honth, Sohl, Liptan, Gömdr, and Zips. In the E. the Carpathians of Transylvania traverse the counties of Seuthmar, Bihar, Arad, Krasna, and Temes. In the W., beyond the Danube, the country is traversed by counterefts of the Alps of Styria, to which belong the Bekony-wald and the Vertes mountains. The countries of Croatia and the Litorale, in the S.W. are crossed by branches of the Danube Alps. These different mountains enclose two great plains, the smaller of which, about 4,300 sq. m. in extent, is in the W., between the offsets of the Alps and Carpathians, and the other in the E., with an area of about 21,000 sq. m., traversed by the Danube and the Theiss, at an elevation of from 300 to 400 feet above the level of the sea. This region is so flat that the rivers have a very sluggish course, and a great part of the surface is covered with marshes and sand dunes. The rivers of Hungary belong to the basins of the Danube and the Theiss, and have generally a S. course, only one, the Poprada, having a N. direction. Principal river the Danube, which enters Hungary on the W. at Presburg, flows generally E. 270 m. to Waltzen, then S. 180 m. to Vinkovar, and again E. 190 m. to Orsova, where it enters Wallachia. Its principal affluents in Hungary are, on the right the Leythe, Enab, Canba, Barvitz, Drave, Sava, and Temes; left the March (on W. border), Wag, Neutra, Gran, and the Theiss, which has a S. course of nearly 400 m., and numerous large tributaries. The principal lakes are the Flatten Sea or Lake Balaton, Neumiedler Sea, and Lake Faldia, the most extensive marsh in the Hanag, between the counties Wieselburg and Odenburg, which has an area of 126 sq. m.; the whole extent of marsh is reckoned at 1,932 sq. m. The largest canals are the Franciscan canal, between the Danube and the Theiss, and the Bega canal, in the Banat, which also joins the Danube. The climate varies exceedingly: in the mountainous districts it is cold and severe, while in the E. it is so genial that the vine, olives, fig, and other southern fruits are grown. It is in general healthy, except in the marshy districts. The chief mineral products are gold, silver, copper, cobalt, salt, stone, and coal.

Gold is most abundant in Transylvania, and silver in Hungary. The gold washings of several of the rivers are important. Copper is abundant, partly average about 34,108 centners; and iron, widely distributed, yields an average of 260,237 centners. Lead, on an average of 5 years, yields only 4,178 centners. Opals are found in the county Sáros. Coal and turf both occur, the latter most widely distributed. Coal is but little worked. Mineral springs are numerous, and many of them celebrated for their medicinal qualities. — Hungary is generally fertile in grain, which is exported to a considerable extent. Chief crops, rye, barley, oats, maize, millet, buck-wheat, and rice. The level regions of the counties Bacs and Temesvar possess the richest soil. The mountains are covered with dense forests. The cultivation of the vine is carried to great perfection. Next to France, Hungary produces the greatest quantity of wine of any country in Europe, and the quality of several of its vineyards, especially that of Tokay, is unrivalled. Tobacco is an important product, the annual amount averaging 400,000 centners, great part of which is exported. Domestic animals comprise horses, horned cattle, buffaloes, sheep and swine. In the N.W. counties they are of middle size, in the S. and E. they are smaller and more active. The rich pastures of Hungary produce some of the finest cattle in Europe. Great improvements have recently been made in the breed of sheep. Swine are reared in the forests in vast herds, the number in 1838 was supposed to be upwards of 5,000,000. Wild and domestic fowls are abundant. Bees are extensively reared. Fish are plentiful in the rivers and lakes, and the Theiss is reckoned the richest in fish of any river in Europe. The chief occupations of the pop are agriculture, cattle rearing, and mining. Manufactures, which are unimportant, comprise woolens, linens, silks, paper (which is made by English machinery in the county Gömdr), tobacco, and ironware. There are 300 breweries. Placed between rich pastoral countries on the E., and manufacturing districts on the W., Hungary is well situated for trade, its only sea coast, indeed, is a slip of 123 m. on the Adriatic, at its S.W. extremity; but it has numerous large navigable rivers, including the Danube, with its affluents the Theiss, Drave, and Sava. From 500 to 1,000 vessels trade on the Danube from Hungary to Venna, exchanging grain, and other raw materials for merchandise. A new impulse was given to this trade by the introduction of steam-packets in 1830. The roads in many parts of the country are very bad, but railway communication has been established in the W. portion. [Austria.] Hungary is peopled by numerous distinct races, speaking different languages, the chief are Hungarian or Magyar, Slavonian, German, and Wallachian. The Magyars are of Asiatic origin, and many of them are Protestants. Their language has recently been substituted for Latin in official correspondence. The different races include the Slovaks, Croats, Rumanians, Wandians, etc. The Wallachians have also their peculiar language. The Germans, who for 8 centuries have been spread over the country, have in many places lost their language and nationality. Besides these principal nations, there are many Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and Gipsies. The greatest number of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics, and next to these communities of the Greek Church, Calvinists, Lutherans, and Jews. The proportions, for Hungary and Transylvania, being, in 1844 — Roman Catholics 1,400,000, Greek Catholics 1,200,000, Protestants 1,000,000.

hung Confession) 1,048,900. Reformed 2,018,900. Unitarians 44,000, Greek (not united) 2,125,100, and Jews 272,020. The chief educational establishments are the university at Pesth, a lyceum at Erlau, 7 schools of philosophy, 65 gymnasia, 68 Latin, and numerous parish schools. Education is in a backward state, although the higher classes are well educated, and generally familiar with foreign languages. The first inhabitants of Hungary mentioned in history, were the Pannonians. The Magyars conquered it in the 9th century. Their followers embraced Christianity. Stephen, the last duke, assumed the title of king A.D. 1000, and added Transylvania to his dominions. Ferdinand I. of Austria was the first prince of Hapsburg who reigned in Hungary, being elected by the diet in 1526, and the succession fixed in the Imperial house in 1687. Since the termination of the civil wars in 1711, Austria has possessed the country; but as the union was voluntary on the part of Hungary, it was never in reality a dependency of Austria, the two countries being united by having a common sovereign, and the power of the king controlled by the Hungarian diet, but recent disputes have brought about a change of relations between the two countries. The insurrection of 1848 was suppressed, the predominant power of the Magyars destroyed, and the rival nations who helped to secure the victory to Austria, rewarded. Thus led, in 1860, to a dismemberment of the ancient kingdom, and the organization of new territorial divisions, which now comprise five great circumscriptions or districts, named after the capital cities, Pesth, Presburg, Odenburg, Kaschan, and Grosswardenau. The country is placed under a civil and military governor, under whose direction is a general councillor for each of the five districts. These new functionaries entered on the administration of affairs on 1st August 1853. [CROATIA, SLAVONIA, TRANSYLVANIA, &c.]

the Orkney Islands. The island also contains numerous small mud volcanoes and intermittent thermal springs, in the chief of which, the Great Geyser, the water, at a depth of 72 feet, is 30° above the boiling point. The climate is very variable; storms of extreme violence are frequent, summer moist, in winter the sky is dark and gloomy, but lighted up by brilliant displays of the aurora borealis. Temperature more elevated than in any other country in the same latitude, mean of year at Reykjavik 40° Fahr. The lower limit of snow in lat 65° is 3,100 feet, 800 or 900 feet being the highest due to latitude. The S coasts, washed by a prolongation of the Gulf Stream, are much milder than in the N, and generally free from ice. Forests formerly abounded, but the island is now destitute of trees, except a few stunted birches. the want of fuel is severely felt, although the Gulf Stream and the polar currents occasionally float drift-wood to its shores, and a fine white turf is used. No grain of any kind can be raised, but cabbage and potatoes are cultivated. The flora of Iceland is nearly allied to that of Scandinavia, comprising mosses and a few shrubs. The most important domestic animal is the sheep, which, with the horse, ox, pig, and dog, were introduced from Norway during last century. In 1845 there were 700,000 sheep, 25,000 head of cattle, and 32,000 horses on the island. Reindeer, introduced in 1770, now roam in large herds, but are not domesticated, the polar bear is sometimes cast on the shores from the northern ice fields. Fish are very abundant on all the coasts, and birds are numerous. Commerce consists in the exchange of wool, butter, skin, tallow, and oil, for European manufactures. The only means of transport is by horses, as there are no carriage roads in the island. Iceland is divided into 3 amts or counties, viz., Suderant, Vesterant, and Norðr and Osterant, and these are subdivided into 19 sýssel. The island was discovered by the Northerners in the 9th century and came into the possession of Denmark in 1380. The Icelanders belong to the Scandinavian race, they are attached to their country, and hospitable to strangers, their religion is Lutheran, there is only one school, the college at Reykjavik, with a president, 8 professors, and 80 to 100 students, but domestic education is general, and the people are intelligent, and are universally educated to the extent of reading and writing. Their affairs are regulated by a council called Althing composed of 1 representative for Reykjavik, and 1 for each of the 19 sýssel, their first meeting was held on 1st July 1433. The only town is Reykjavik. Pop 1,200. There are upwards of 20 trading vessels, mostly on the coasts. From 40 to 45 vessels sail annually from Denmark to Iceland. Formerly the trade was a government monopoly, but it was thrown open by a decree of the Althing in 1803.
